Car sales and credit on the rise

Shepherd sees glimmer of hope in jobless trend

By ROSS TIEMAN, INDUSTRIAL CORRESPONDENT

THE number of people out of work increased by 7,400 in March, the smallest monthly rise for almost two years.

Gillian Shepherd, the new employment secretary, spoke of "glimmers of hope" but, while cautioning against attaching too much to one month's figures, she said that the apparent fall in the rate of job losses was accompanied by other encouraging signs. "The number of people becoming unemployed has eased over recent months, and more people are leaving unemployment and getting back to work," she said.

Britain's biggest credit information group, Infolink, yesterday reported a rise in credit enquiries and used-car sales in the immediate aftermath of the election. Applications for retail, motor and home loans were up 5.5 per cent, supporting predictions from employers that sales in the high street should resume their growth this month after a retraction in March attributed to election jitters.

Sales of new cars jumped by 20 per cent in the five days after polling day over the same period last year, manufacturers said yesterday, although George Simpson, chairman of the Rover Group, cautioned against rushing into over-confidence.

There is also evidence of an improvement in the competitiveness of manufacturers. The year on year growth in output per head, at 4.3 per cent, was the best for more than two years. The amount of short-time working also fell, there was a modest rise in overtime and the number of days lost to industrial action remained at an all-time low.

These successes, however, must be set against figures which showed that the number employed in manufacturing fell by 31,000 during February to 4,581,000. That suggests job losses in manufacturing accounted for more than three out of four of the total increase in unemployment during February, reckoned at 37,800.

Mrs Shepherd said the economy was now keeping up with efficiency gains by main international competitors. "This and growing business confidence should mean better news for jobs and those out of work," she said. Nonetheless, Britain's unemployment rate, at 9.6 per cent, remains the third worst in Europe, after Ireland, at 17 per cent, and Spain, at 16.5. The total unemployed rose for the 23rd consecutive month to reach 2,652,400, 9.4 per cent of the workforce. The monthly total before seasonal adjustment was down for the first time since October by 3,010 to 2,707,477.

Mrs Shepherd took the opportunity to signal a shift in policy at the employment department: "I will be looking at the range of measures on offer to ensure that as we come out of the recession they offer people effective help in getting back to work."

Tony Blair, Labour's employment spokesman, said the trend was still firmly upwards. "Even on the government's figures there are still almost 2.7 million unemployed with the numbers of long-term unemployed rising sharply," he said.

City commentators, who had been expecting an underlying increase of around 35,000, were surprised at the apparent flattening in the rate of job losses. John Sheppard, chief UK economist with merchant bank SG Warburg, said the figures were "surprisingly good", adding: "We are clearly past the worst of the unemployment increases but we are likely to see some erratic figures for a time."

The number out of work actually fell, after seasonal adjustment, in the North West (to 10.3 per cent), the North (11), Wales (9.4) and Scotland (9.2), but continued to rise strongly in the South East (to 8.8 per cent) and East Anglia (7.2), which have seen some of the biggest rises during the recession. Unemployment in these two areas is still below the national average.

Northern Ireland, with 14.3 per cent out of work, remains a blackspot, while in greater London, where 407,000 are now without jobs, the 10.1 per cent unemployment is now the fourth worst in Britain after Northern Ireland, the North West and the West Midlands.

Abandoned van holds up holiday getaway

By JOHN VINCENT

MOTORISTS hoping for a quick escape from work at the start of the Easter holiday faced frustration and long delays last night when they were turned back at junction 1 of the M1 in north London. Police closed both carriageways for 90 minutes because of a suspect vehicle causing big hold-ups. Explosives experts faced long delays in reaching the scene.

Rail passengers were equally exasperated. All trains passing through Mill Hill were halted, British Rail said. Services into St Pancras and the Thameslink were affected. A BR spokesman said: "We were asked to suspend all movements at 17.50 to night while they investigate the van. Trains were crowded with people going off for the weekend." Rail services resumed after the van was cleared at 7.21 pm.

The motorway was closed at the start of the rush hour after a patrol spotted a suspicious vehicle on the hard shoulder. Drivers eager to escape found the motorway closed in both directions from Mill Hill, north London, to Scratchwood Services.

Earlier, drivers heading north on the M1 had been treated to 31 miles of what the AA described as "heavy and slow" traffic, from the M25 as far as Newport Pagnal.

4,000 Lloyd's names face personal financial ruin

By JONATHAN PRYNN

UP TO 4,000 Lloyd's names could face personal financial ruin as a result of a landmark High Court judgment yesterday.

Mr Justice Saville ruled against a group of more than 800 names who were trying to prevent Lloyd's from seizing their assets to pay their underwriting losses. They were on syndicates hit by claims from catastrophes such as Piper Alpha and Hurricane Hugo. The judgment means that Lloyd's can proceed with arrangements to draw on financial assets put up by the names as security when they joined Lloyd's.

A new action group for names who will be effectively bankrupted by their Lloyd's losses is to be formed next week. One estimated that up to 4,000 names will be ruined.

Technically, Lloyd's is never responsible for a name being made legally bankrupt. More than 900 names have already applied to the Lloyd's hardship committee, which has the discretion to pay off a ruined name's outstanding debts in return for an agreed programme of repayments during the name's life.

In most cases the names are required to sell their homes and more valuable assets and move to smaller premises. Their living expenses will also be largely determined by the committee. After the death of the name, Lloyd's can claim the name's remaining assets.

Lloyd's went to court to defend the primacy of unlimited liability which underpins the financial security of the market. One name involved in the High Court legal action said: "This just shows that when you sign on the dotted line at Lloyd's your liability goes beyond your last cuff-link."

Yard bans notes plastic

By RICHARD FORD, HOME CORRESPONDENT

SCOTLAND Yard is to ban police officers from using a special plastic sheet in their notebooks after lawyers said that it made testing for the doctored notes impossible.

In a letter in The Times today, Sir Peter Imbert, the Metropolitan Police commissioner, says that the thin plastic sheet used for the thin seven months is to be abandoned immediately.

He acted after criticism from lawyers and in the media that the instruction to officers on surveillance operations to use the stiff plastic sheet was a manoeuvre to prevent Esda [electronic document analysis] testing. The system has been used to correct a number of miscarriages of justice, including the wrongful convictions of the Birmingham Six, Guildford Four and Tottenham Three.

The plastic sheets were issued with log books to place under the page and provide firm backing while taking notes on the street. But that ensured that no indentation would be left on underlying pages, making Esda analysis useless.

Afghan leader ousted as rebels close in

FROM CHRISTOPHER THOMAS IN KABUL

PRESIDENT Najibullah, Afghanistan's former communist leader, who clung to power as the mujahidin rebels closed in on Kabul, was yesterday overthrown and turned back when trying to flee the country.

Ghulam Yaqubi, the head of security, committed suicide as mujahidin rebels surrounded the capital, closing the book on an administration abandoned by Moscow and encircled by its Muslim fundamentalist enemies. Many of the former president's close associates now fear reprisals. A four-man council has taken over the running of the country.

Western governments fear a bloodbath. The rebels who have fought the communist-dominated government since 1978, came within 25 miles of Kabul. Many of the rebel groups, united only in their hatred of the communists and their former Soviet backers, have already begun to quarrel among themselves.

Dr Najibullah, a former secret police chief installed by the Kremlin six years ago, attempted to make a getaway with one of his brothers but was turned away from Kabul airport by troops. He was reported to have taken refuge in a United Nations office, although there were rumours that he had been arrested. His wife and three children fled to India several days ago.

Dr Najibullah had been ready to resign to make way for a transitional government and elections under the United Nations peace plan. The end of his rule came suddenly, however, as the guerrillas made a final push for Kabul. Abdul Wakil, the foreign minister, told a news conference that the president had been replaced by four vice-presidents of the ruling Watan (homeland) party.

Kabul radio attacked Dr Najibullah for resigning illegally and leaving a power vacuum. It appealed to the army and civil service to help set up a transitional council.

Mr Wakil last night accused Dr Najibullah of deception. He had been hated by the mujahidin and by his

Boy wakes to find brother, aged four, strangled

By ADAM FRESCO

A BOY aged four was sexually assaulted and strangled in his bed as his brother slept in the same room. Matthew Robinson's body was discovered by his brother Jason on Wednesday morning in the lodging house run by his parents.

The parents reported what they thought was a cot death but a post mortem examination showed he had been strangled and sexually assaulted. Matthew and Jason, 9, were in an unlocked bedroom on the third floor of the house in Keyham, Plymouth, Devon. Their parents Alan Robinson, 63, an inventor, and his wife Christine, 30, were sleeping on the floor above.

The Robinsons' large Victorian house, which they own, is split into single room beds which are occupied by regular tenants and other people who may stay occasional nights as casual guests.

There were thought to be five tenants staying at the house at the time of the murder, some sleeping on the same floor as Matthew and others in ground floor rooms. A number of them are helping police with their inquiries.

Matthew was put to bed about 9pm on Tuesday night by his father and Jason was put to bed by his mother half an hour later.

Matthew was unattended during that time and was "seemingly asleep" when his brother came to bed. About 8.30am on Wednesday, Jason awoke but could not rouse his brother in the lower bunk and called his parents. Jason, who has been interviewed by a police child protection team, saw and heard nothing during the night, he said.

The house is used as a Department of Social Services lodging property, although it is not known if there were any DSS lodgers there at the time.

Detective Superintendent Malcolm Corp, leading a team of 30 detectives, said: "We are looking for a very strong sexual deviant who is at present at large on the streets of Plymouth. What that boy was subjected to makes it a horrendous murder. The killer might well have been an outsider from off the streets. The other people living there are being interviewed as potential witnesses."

"This is one of the most horrendous crimes we have ever come across. We have not identified a suspect at this time. The child's parents are totally distressed by what has happened. They are caring, loving parents and they are naturally very upset."

"The house has numerous tenants and is not really secure. People come and go as they wish and people call there. There are various residents in the house and we are going through the process of making forensic tests and taking statements, which may take some time, and the inquiry is now mushrooming out from the house."

"We believe the assault and death occurred between 9pm on Tuesday and 8.30am on Wednesday when the family doctor was called because the older brother found he could not wake Matthew."

"The boy must have subjected to a great deal of pain and discomfort from the sexual assault before he died."

Vital scientific evidence is being gathered from the house. Police are working on several theories. One is that Matthew was murdered in his bed in the thirty minutes before his brother Jason was put to bed and another is that Matthew was killed during the night while Jason was asleep.

Couple remanded on explosives plot charges

By ALISON ROBERTS

A MAN and woman were remanded in custody yesterday charged with conspiring to cause explosions in central London and possessing Semtex explosive and six automatic assault rifles.

Ethel Audrey Lamb, 60, and James Joseph Canning, 36, both of Islip Gardens, Northolt, west London, appeared before Arbour Square magistrates in Stepney, east London, amid police, high security. During the four and a half minute hearing, Mrs

Lamb, wearing a blue tracksuit, was remanded in custody for a week. She will appear before magistrates again on April 23.

Mr Canning, unemployed, is also charged with causing an explosion in Bridge Lane, Soho, on April 6 and with possessing a loaded Smith and Wesson revolver with intent to resist arrest on April 13. Mr Canning, dressed in a blue V-neck sweater and blue trousers, was remanded in custody for four weeks to appear in court again on May 14.

The charges were brought under the Explosive Substances Act 1883 and the Firearms Act 1968. Three police officers stood in the dock with the couple, two flanking them and one in the middle. Throughout the hearing neither Lamb nor Canning spoke but stared ahead at the magistrate, Daphne Wickham. The remand application was made by Richard Glenister, for the prosecution. There was no application for bail and reporting restrictions were not lifted.

A large police operation was mounted to transport the couple from Paddington Green police station, west London, where they had been held in cells last night. Canning and Lamb arrived at 9.30am in separate armoured vehicles escorted by a police helicopter. The operation was watched from neighbouring rooftops by police marksmen. Everyone entering the court underwent a body search and all bags were checked. The couple were driven away two hours later in a police convey.

A third man held by police in London under the Prevention of Terrorism Act was still being questioned last night. Two hundred mourners were at the funeral yesterday of one of the victims of Friday's IRA blast in the City of London.

Family, friends and workmates of Paul Butt, 29, attended the service at Corbets Tey crematorium, Essex. Danielle Carter, 15, and Thomas Casey, 49, a doorman at the Baltic Exchange, also died in the blast that injured over 90 people.

Two more named in hunt for killers

By CRAIG SETON

TWO more of the three Irishmen being sought by police in connection with the murder of an army recruiting sergeant were identified by Derbyshire police yesterday. They are Declan Duffy, 19, nicknamed Wacko, and Anthony Gorman, 22, known as Fanta. Both are from Belfast. They and Joseph Magee, 26, are wanted in connection with the killing of Sergeant Michael Newman, 34, who was shot in the head on Monday as he left the combined army and navy careers office in Derby where he worked. The Irish National Liberation Army (INLA) has claimed responsibility for the murder.

A Derby woman who was detained for questioning after the shooting was arrested yesterday under the Prevention of Terrorism Act. Police have not named the woman, who was originally held under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act with three other people. They were released.

Don Davostan, an assistant chief constable of Derbyshire, said yesterday that the three men still being sought were dangerous and should not be approached. "The police should be contacted immediately and we will take the appropriate action."

He appealed for an anonymous woman caller who had telephoned police yesterday with "vital information" to contact them again. The woman, who spoke with an Irish accent, rang off before she could be questioned.

Declan Duffy is described as extensively tattooed. On his right forearm, he has a tattoo of a rifle and a red star. On his left hands are the letters INLA. He is about 5ft 7in, with short, light brown hair that is receding and thinning. He weighs about 10½ stone, with an athletic build, and is tattooed. He occasionally wears gold-rimmed glasses.

Anthony Gorman is 6ft, of slim build, weighs 12 stone and has short, dark brown hair, blue eyes and a Mexican-type moustache. He has a tattoo of a heart on his left hand and the letter F on his left forearm.

An inquest into Sgt Newman's death was opened and adjourned yesterday.

Souness in intensive care again

By ALISON ROBERTS

THE Liverpool football manager Graeme Souness suffered a setback in his recovery from heart surgery and was taken into intensive care yesterday.

The surgeon who performed the operation was called to his hospital bedside shortly after midnight. The nature of the relapse is unknown but Mr Souness, 38, will now spend another week in hospital. He spent half an hour in the intensive care ward of Alexandra hospital in Cheadle, Greater Manchester, before being moved to a progressive care unit.

Mr Souness's friend Karen Levy hurried to the hospital to be with him. He was visited earlier in the day by Elton Welsby, the independent television sports presenter.

The setback came hours after the Liverpool Football Club board said that it would meet to discuss public protests at Mr Souness's dealings with The Sun. He was pictured in the newspaper kissing Miss Levy on the day the club held a third anniversary memorial service for the 95 fans who died in the Hillsborough disaster.

Allotments barred to poll tax rebels

By DOUGLAS BROOM
LOCAL GOVERNMENT CORRESPONDENT

THE potting shed, suburban man's last refuge from the reality of modern life, succumbed to the community charge yesterday when a city council threatened to ban poll tax defaulters from its allotments.

Portsmouth city council announced that the right to tend prize-winning leeks on council property would in future be granted only to those who paid their poll tax on time.

The council, run by an alliance of Labour and the Liberal Democrats, is taking action against defaulters whose refusal to pay the poll tax has added £25 a head to the bills of every adult in the town.

Councillors are considering a plan to introduce membership cards for local people wanting to use allotments and other leisure services such as swimming pools and sports grounds.

Under the plan, cards would be issued only to people who had paid their community charge. Non-payers would be barred from using public facilities.

The council has also decided to publish the names of 8,800 people who failed to register to pay the poll tax even though their names appeared on electoral registers in the year before the charge was introduced. The council is still owed almost £5 million in unpaid poll tax from the 1990-1 financial year and a further £3.4 million for 12 months to April 1 this year.

Alan Burnett, the council leader, said: "If people do not pay their poll tax they shouldn't be using council facilities. We hope also to publish the names of those who have not paid a penny yet to give them ample warning that bailiffs may be on the way. We are also considering having non-payers' cars clamped."

Cliff Thornton, finance director of Labour-controlled Thamesdown district council in Swindon, Wiltshire, has called on councillors to experience at first hand the feelings of people paying the tax.

He told the council's policy committee that his staff were suffering verbal abuse, particularly over the £29.50 added to every bill to make up for losses caused by non-payment.

Customer shot in bank raid

A BANK customer was hit by a ricocheting bullet yesterday when a raider fired at staff behind a protective screen who refused to hand over money. The bullet bounced off the screen and hit the customer in the hand.

The customer was treated in hospital for a graze wound. The raider, who was wearing a balaclava helmet, fled empty-handed from the National Westminster bank at Ruistip, northwest London.

A telephonist who was on duty upstairs at the bank said: "The robber was about 30 to 35 and came barging into the bank pushing customers out of the way. He demanded money, but no money was given."

He said the raider then pulled out a revolver and opened fire on a cashier. The bullet bounced back. "Within minutes there were loads of police cars outside," he added.

Scotland Yard said: "At 2.10pm there was an attempted robbery at the National Westminster bank and a man was shot. There was an injury to his hand, which is not believed to be serious."

The customer was treated at Mount Vernon hospital.

Airport arrivals cash in to find instant sunshine

BY THE time Caron McCouaig had finished her shift at Gatwick airport yesterday afternoon there was a pile of requests for instant holidays in the sun still awaiting her attention.

Caron and the seven other staff of Thomas Cook's new travel shop in the south terminal had been rushed off their feet all day answering a stream of telephone calls and personal visitors all wanting to get away — often with no fixed idea where but all hoping to cash in on the massive discounts offered on flights and seats as airlines and tour operators tried to off-load their last remaining unsold capacity.

Twelve remaining seats on an Airtours flight to Lanzarote, for example, could be had for £79 each three hours before departure compared with the brochure price of £260. Anyone interested had to stay for 14 nights, perhaps explaining why, even at that knock down price, there were no takers.

By midday most of the other offers on the "late availability" screens in the shop since the tour operators opened for business at 7am, and sent messages to travel agency computers gradually reducing the price, had been snapped up. "We have been astonished at the demand for instant travel since we opened two weeks ago," said Glyn Dixon, the shop manager. "Some people simply arrive with suitcases and ask if they can go immediately to whatever destination we have on offer. As long as they arrive two hours before departure to enable the airline to complete its paperwork it can usually be done."

Once the Easter rush is over and Gatwick returns to normal, many more such deals are expected to be made available at the last moment, enabling anyone with the nerve and necessary flexibility to cut the cost of a holiday by at least half.

Some believe that Gatwick and other airports, where travel agents have for the first time been allowed to set up shop, may soon become more like railway stations with passengers buying tickets just before departure as a matter of course. "If the trade and market forces demand that, we can make the facilities available," said Alan Munds, Gatwick managing director, who yesterday disclosed plans to enlarge the departure lounges and check-in areas to cope with any surge in demand.

Generally the travel industry does not like to talk about late availability offers, preferring instead to convince passengers to book early. After all if they can sell a holiday at full brochure price three months before departure, and bank any money paid in advance, why should they draw attention to the kind of offers which were being displayed in Thomas Cook's airport shop window yesterday?

They would, of course, argue that most of the people who tried to fly away yesterday were disappointed, but it was Maundy Thursday, traditionally one of the busiest days of the year.

The roads are likely to be especially busy this weekend and police and the motorway organisations are bracing themselves for possible traffic jams in some of the most popular spots.

The fight for market share of trans-Atlantic services was hotly contested yesterday when British Airways announced new Apex year round fares which cut some prices by 45 per cent.

Unwary at risk in Highlands

By KERRY GILL

HORDES of climbers, walkers and skiers will be attracted to the Highlands this weekend at a time when the unwary regularly fall victim to the region's notoriously fickle spring climate.

Easter, according to official records, can be one of the worst periods for accidents. Mountaineers who have travelled a long distance are not prepared to abort a climb even if the weather is atrocious, there are more inexperienced and ill-clad hill-walkers on the slopes, and conditions, alternately freezing and thawing, can be at their most perilous.

Hamish MacInnes, leader of Glencoe's 24-hour mountain rescue team, said that there had been recent snowfalls and that freezing conditions had developed higher up. Slippages could result in bad accidents because the relatively light snow covering meant that boulders were exposed.

A slight thaw could lead to avalanches higher up, or cornices breaking, as happened last week in the Cairngorms when two men fell 500ft and survived when they landed on deep, soft snow.

Parents fly to US after murder of 'brilliant' daughter

By DAVID YOUNG

THE parents of a 27-year-old British woman killed in the French Quarter of New Orleans flew to the American city yesterday as its police intensified the hunt for the mugger who shot her.

Police have warned tourists in New Orleans that they can "advise them but not protect them". They said a mugger "high on drugs" killed Julie Stott. She had been with her friend Peter Ellis when a thief drove up and demanded money. He forced the couple to lie on the ground before opening fire, hitting Miss Stott but missing Mr Ellis by inches.

Miss Stott was described yesterday as a textile designer with a brilliant future. She had met up in Los Angeles with Mr Ellis, 27, who had been working in New Zealand for 18 months, before travelling to New Orleans for the jazz festival.

They were leaving a restaurant in a normally quiet quarter of the town on Wednesday when the gunman drove up and demanded money and valuables. Neither resisted but the man opened fire before driving off empty-handed. Mr Ellis was unhurt.

At Sundour Fabrics, the textile firm in Bolton, Greater Manchester, where Miss Stott was development and design manager, the chief executive Peter Robinson said: "We can't believe it. She was a super girl. I took her on six years ago and she finished up managing our design workshop. She was brilliant at the job and had a great future."

"They had not been there very long and had just come out of a restaurant. Julie wouldn't have resisted at all. She was used to travelling and used to go abroad for us with exhibitions."

Miss Stott recently bought a flat in Eccles, Greater Manchester. She joined the Bolton firm after leaving the University of Manchester Institute of Science and Technology with a degree in textiles and design. Her parents, Ray and Margaret Stott, from Middleton, Greater Manchester, flew to New Orleans yesterday.

Jim Stewart, a murder squad detective in the city, said: "We can only warn people about the dangers on the street, but we cannot protect them. Tourists get robbed in London too, but our guys have guns."

"This girl and her friend had come here because they loved jazz. They just wanted to see where the greats had played."

Mr Stewart said that the couple had co-operated fully with their attacker, who appeared to witnesses to be high on drugs. He had demanded their cash and valuables when suddenly his attitude changed and he started to fire a handgun before jumping back into a car and driving away.

A witness, Cathan McCandlish, said: "Nowhere is safe for a young woman to walk around."

Victim: Julie Stott, murdered in New Orleans

Dangers behind carnival mask

NEW Orleans, like the Mardi Gras masks that are sold in its souvenir shops, conceals a darkness behind a colourful appeal.

This is the warm Southern city that breaks into riotous festivities every March. It is the city whose heart is the shuttered old French Quarter, the home of the Preservation Hall jazz band, of the celebrated if slightly sleazy Bourbon Street, of Cajun and Creole cuisine. It is the starting point for steamboat trips up the Mississippi and visits to the plantation homes of the Old South.

New Orleans attracts 11 million visitors a year and is the third most popular destination in America for foreign travellers. But it is more than that. It is one of the most dangerous cities in the country, where 346 murders were recorded in 1991, an increase of 13 per cent on the previous year.

In 1990, according to the FBI, New Orleans had the second highest per capita murder rate of any major American city, beaten only by Washington DC. The rate was 61 victims per 100,000 residents. For the whole of Britain in 1988 the rate was two per 100,000. In 1990 New Orleans moved from having the seventeenth worst overall crime rate in America to the tenth.

It suffers the same afflictions as most other American cities, only worse. It has a rampant drug underworld that breeds crime, particularly in its huge public housing projects. Guns are readily available. Louisiana is one of the poorest states.

Exacerbating this blight has been a record of political shenanigans and extremism dating back at least half a century to the days of Governor Huey Long. Metairie, a white suburb of New Orleans, is the base of the race-baiting David Duke, the former state legislator and Ku Klux Klan member running for president. The governor is the roguish Edwin Edwards, who has twice been tried and acquitted on corruption charges and once boasted that only "a dead girl or live boy in my bed" could keep him from winning office.

Admirer leaves Paisley £50,000

By ROBIN YOUNG

IAN Paisley has been left £50,000 in the will of an Englishwoman he never met. Ellen Newton, of Hindhead, Surrey, who died in January aged 86, had seen the Democratic Unionist Party leader only on television and read about him in newspapers.

She has left him the money "for the assistance of members of the Protestant community of Northern Ireland suffering financial distress as a result of terrorist activities within the province, as he shall determine".

Mr Paisley's son, Ian, said his father was delighted at the extremely helpful gesture. A trust fund had been set up to invest the money. He said: "If this money had been available after the Tebbane massacre it could have been extremely useful to families who lost their only breadwinner." Eight Protestant workers were killed when the IRA blew up their minibus at the co. Tyrone village in January.

Mrs Newton, who had no children, divided all but £7,000 of her £2,791,348 net estate between charities and churches.

Shooting of farmer accidental

By MICHAEL HORSNELL

A WEALTHY farmer who was shot dead in a copse was accidentally killed by a device he made for shooting foxes, police said.

Peter Jowett, 43, was probably the victim of a gust of wind which completed an electrical circuit and triggered a 357 magnum bullet from the gun-mounted gadget he built to protect lambs on his land at Winterslow, Wiltshire.

A coroner's inquest will be held at Salisbury on May 29. Det Chief Insp David Sinclair, who is leading the investigation, said: "We are confident this was a tragic accident with the gun activating while Mr Jowett was close by. We can speculate it was for the purpose of shooting animals but we don't actually know the reason. We must always keep an open mind but at this stage we are not treating it as a murder enquiry."

Although police have not ruled out the possibility that someone else pulled the trigger, they are convinced there is no connection between Mr Jowett's death and an incident last November when he was stabbed by an intruder at his home. Police are appealing to engineering companies from which Mr Jowett may have sought help in making the device.

For sale: a fairway to heaven

By JOHN YOUNG

ANY golfer who dreams of playing undisturbed and unhindered by others on the course might like to consider buying Wootton Hall, in north Lincolnshire, which is being offered for sale by its owner, John Halmshaw.

Although golf courses in the grounds of country houses are increasingly common, they have nearly all been developed as commercial ventures to support the upkeep of the estate. A course built for its owner's exclusive delectation or frustration is a rarity.

Mr Halmshaw bought the eighteenth century house from the Earl of Yarborough 25 years ago. He designed and built the nine-hole par-three course in the grounds in 1980, complete with its own "club house" and bar.

"Some people have swimming pools, some have tennis courts. I'd rather play golf than swim or play tennis," he said. "It is quite a difficult course, and quite a number of my friends have got extremely exasperated with it."

The house, built in 1796, contains two Adam-style fireplaces salvaged from the London home of Lord Yarborough's mother, which was destroyed in the second world war. It is for sale through Dickinson, Day & Markham, of Brigg, Humberside.

Asian immigrant appointed QC

By RICHARD FORD, HOME CORRESPONDENT

AN IMMIGRANT who came to Britain unable to speak English was one of 69 Queen's Counsel announced yesterday. Mukhtar Hussain is also the first barrister from an ethnic minority community practising outside London to be made a QC. Three years ago, he was the first Pakistani to be appointed a recorder of the Crown Court.

Mr Hussain, 42, arrived in England with his parents when he was 13. His father began work as a labourer in a textile mill in Preston, Lancashire, before starting a grocery shop.

Mr Hussain had to go to a special school to learn English before he could begin his full-time studies. He took O and A levels at a technical college and decided not to take up a place at the London School of Economics because he did not want to be a financial burden on his parents.

Instead he went to the College of Law in London to take his legal exams and was called to the Bar at 21. He is based on the northern circuit and specialises in criminal and immigration work.

As he prepared to celebrate taking silk, Mr Hussain, from Rochdale, Greater Manchester, said it proved that, if people worked hard enough, they could overcome other disadvantages. "It does not matter about your background or colour," he said. "People can make the breakthrough, though it may take a little longer than normal. The old concept that you had to be from a particular privileged class to make the breakthrough has gone."

Among the new QCs is Estella Hindley, the first woman practising in Birmingham to take silk, and David Pannick, who at 36 is one of the youngest. Mr Pannick, a fellow of All Souls College, Oxford, is a regular columnist with The Times.

This year there were 420 applications to take silk, including 34 from women and 14 from ethnic minorities. The 69 appointments include seven women (21 per cent of female applicants) and one Asian (7 per cent of ethnic minority applicants). Last year seven women were appointed from 24 applicants.

The Nation's Building Society

On a loan of £60,000 with a purchase price of £200,000 first time buyers would qualify for a 2.44% discount in the first year of the Society's standard variable rate giving a rate of 8.55%. A rate of 10.55% is assumed in years 2-25. Monthly payments would therefore be £374.67 in year 1 and £461.57 in years 2-25 giving an APR of 11.2% (variable) and Total Amount Payable of £220,750. Home movers taking a loan of £120,000 with a purchase price of £160,000 would qualify for a 1.99% discount in the first year of the Society's standard variable rate giving a rate of 9.9%. A rate of 10.44% is assumed in years 2-25. Monthly payments would therefore be £228.13 in year 1 and £273.00 in years 2-25 giving an APR of 11.1% (variable) and Total Amount Payable of £133,870. Our standard rate is 10.99%. For loans of £60,000 and £120,000 the following would apply: £60,000 loan, monthly payment £461.57, APR 11.2% (variable), Total Amount Payable £220,750. £120,000 loan, monthly payment £273.00, APR 11.1% (variable), Total Amount Payable £133,870. All examples assume 500 monthly payments over 25 years. Please remember that in addition there is a premium to pay for your endowment policy, which varies according to your own personal circumstances. Typically, a couple (male and female, aged 25, both non-smokers, taking out a Nationwide Freedom for Homebuyers policy, over a 25 year period (300 payments) would pay a monthly endowment premium of £25 for a £60,000 mortgage and £107 for a £120,000 mortgage. Freedom for Homebuyers is underwritten by Guardian Assurance PLC, a member of Lloyds and as a unit-linked contract, cash values will fluctuate with unit prices. Full and overriding details are contained in the illustration, acceptance terms and policy document. A free copy is available upon request. All interest charges, repayment of capital, legal fees as shown (legal fees assume that the same solicitor acts for both the Society and the borrower and are in accordance with the guidelines agreed between The Building Societies Association and The Law Society), mortgage application fees as shown and redemption fees of £25 are included in the APRs indicated. In addition in all documented examples building and contents insurance (Room Cover) premiums have been included in the APRs in year 1 and building premiums only in years 2-25 for discounted loans above £60,000. An example of a Room Cover monthly premium for a terraced house in York YO6, with 4 habitable rooms would be £17.99 for both buildings and contents insurance, for buildings only the premium would be £10.46 (300 monthly premiums). It is a condition of the Home to Home offers that buildings and contents insurance is taken with the Society in the first year (Contents only if a leasehold property). Building or contents insurance must be taken in years 2-25 if the interest reduction is taken for loans above £60,000. All payments are quoted net of MARS tax relief. New cervical cancer clue yields faster treatment

BY NIGEL HAWKES, SCIENCE EDITOR

A MORE efficient method of screening for cancer of the cervix could help thousands of women whose smear tests are on the borderline.

Scientists from the Imperial Cancer Research Fund, University College London and the University Hospital, Nottingham, have shown that the smears can be monitored for the presence of a virus that gives a good indication of whether serious disease is likely.

Of the five million women in Britain who have cervical smear tests to detect early traces of cancer, about 250,000 a year show slight abnormalities. Many women with abnormal smears will never develop cervical cancer but the difficulty until now has been deciding what to do when small abnormalities are detected.

Malcolm Anderson of the Nottingham hospital, one of the authors of the study published in tomorrow's issue of The Lancet, says: "In some places, women are offered smear tests at shorter intervals and only referred for treatment if the disease persists or progresses. Elsewhere they are offered colposcopy, which involves a physical examination of the cervix with a microscope. The first could be risky and the second is very costly." The screening service "is inundated by a large number of mildly abnormal smears".

Jack Cusick of the research fund says that of 250,000 women with slight abnormalities, 75,000 women may have an important underlying disease, but without a hospital referral and biopsy there is no means of knowing which they are. Now they believe they may have found a clue which will help determine which smears justify further examination.

The clue is the presence in the cells of a human papilloma virus known as HPV16. The team, which included George Terry and Linda Ho of University College London and Tony Hollingsworth of Nottingham, examined smears from 85 women. Using the technique of polymerase chain reaction (PCR) to amplify the amount of DNA from the HPV16 virus present, they were able to show that in almost 90 per cent of the cases, a high level of HPV16 indicated the presence of severe abnormalities.

Dr Cusick says: "There are other methods for detecting HPV, but they are either too laborious or not accurate enough. We think it is very likely that women with only minor abnormalities but high levels of HPV16 may well have high-grade disease and PCR is a technique which can find this out. These women are in need of further investigation by colposcopy and should not be followed up only by a repeat smear and surveillance."

At present, the polymerase chain reaction machines are not widely available but the team believes that they could be provided if the need were demonstrated.

Butterfly raiders set breeders a-flutter

By DAVID YOUNG

POLICE in rural areas, accustomed to looking out for poachers, cattle rustlers and sheep stealers, have now been told to be on the alert for butterfly thieves.

The gangs are not only stealing valuable rare butterflies but by smashing into glass conservatories where butterflies breed they are threatening to cause changes in temperature and humidity which would kill off entire collections. Security is now being improved at Britain's butterfly farms.

The thieves are believed to be experts who are seeking only the more valuable insects which they mount and sell to collectors. In a raid earlier this week thieves escaped with specimens of the Blue Morpho butterfly from a centre at Stratford-upon-Avon.

Cameras are being used at the New Forest butterfly farm near Ashurst, Hampshire, to monitor the area for signs of thieves. At the farm, Annette Todhunter said: "We have over 40 types of butterfly here and we couldn't afford to lose any. We have never had any problems, but there are many places that have, so we must be alert."

"Although there is quite a trade in breeding butterflies, I doubt that it is breeders who are carrying out these thefts. After all, most species don't live any longer than three weeks, so there wouldn't be much point."

"To me it sounds like they are taken to be killed, framed and sold to collectors. You would need to be an expert to catch them in the first place."

The main target for butterfly raiders is the Blue Morpho, a bright iridescent Malaysian species with a 5in wing span. It is imported into Britain in the pupae stage of development to maintain the stocks at butterfly farms.

The pupae, worth £10 each, are kept in locked zones until they hatch, suffering a 25 per cent mortality rate.

Mixed feelings: HMS Unicorn slipping into the waters of the River Mersey yesterday, ending an era in shipbuilding at Birkenhead.

A crowd of 4,000 was on hand to cheer the launch of the 2,400 tonne submarine. But the champagne celebrations were overshadowed by the knowledge that it will be almost certainly the last vessel built at the Birkenhead shipyard. Cammell Laird's order book is empty and the remaining 1,250 workers are to lose their jobs by June when Cammell-Laird is scheduled for closure by Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering, its parent company.

Workers and management are pinning their hopes of a reprieve on an appeal to Michael Heseltine, the new trade and industry secretary. The yard is scheduled to wind down slowly, shedding jobs at a rate of 100 a month. At a press conference yesterday, Vickers chiefs cited the end of the Cold War as a major factor in its demise. Lord Chalfont, the chairman, announced that the company had so far failed to find a buyer for the shipyard as a whole. He blamed the recession and the contraction of the defence industry. "I do not believe that the reconstruction of the defence industry should be left entirely to commercial interests — the government has to be involved in this," he said.

HMS Unicorn is the last of three Upholder-class subs built for the Royal Navy at the shipyard. The diesel-electric powered hunter-killer submarine will carry 44 officers and crew and cost the defence ministry £100 million. She should be handed over to the Navy in June after fitting-out in dry dock.

The shipyard was founded 160 years ago by John Laird. At its peak it employed 40,000 men and today remains Birkenhead's biggest single employer. Historic vessels built there include HMS Conqueror, the submarine that sank the Belfrago, and HMS Ark Royal, Britain's first aircraft carrier.

Six jailed for £17m mortgage fraud

SIX men who ran a mortgage fraud which netted nearly £3 million in three months were jailed yesterday at Winchester crown court.

A jury was told that mortgages well above the prices of properties, including hotels, were obtained from a building society and two banks. The six were convicted of deception charges involving more than £17 million in loans from the Bank of Scotland, Lombard North Central and the Alliance and Leicester Building Society.

Kamlesh Panchal, 29, of Wembley, north London, described as the operation's planner, fellow accountant Rajinder Kumar, 55, also of Wembley, and Giles Saldanha, 46, a solicitor's clerk from Burnham, Buckinghamshire, were each jailed for two years.

James Lancaster, 42, of Bracknell, Berkshire, an experienced land valuer, was jailed for 15 months. Harjit Singh, 28, of Hounslow, west London, was given 12 months, and Janail Dhanoo, 38, of Southall, north London, six.

Strangeways riot ringleader jailed for ten years

By RONALD FAUX

PAUL Taylor, ringleader of the Strangeways prison riots in Manchester two years ago, was given the maximum sentence of ten years for rioting by a judge at Manchester crown court yesterday.

Three other men were sentenced to between four and nine and a half years for their part in the riot, which led to the longest siege in the history of the prison service. A fifth man who was earlier cleared of rioting was jailed for 18 months for contempt.

Mr Justice Mantell said at the end of the 13-week trial that Taylor had appointed himself judge, jury and executioner. "You were not only one of the leaders of the riot, you participated in some of its worst violence," the judge told Taylor. That had included a savage attack on an inmate who was beaten and hurled from a third floor landing.

The judge said: "The riot was not a protest against real or imagined grievances but a brutal and cowardly attack on wretched creatures whose offences placed them at the bottom of the prison heap. You, Taylor, forgetful of your own past, which includes a conviction for rape, appointed yourself judge, jury and executioner."

Taylor was nearing the end of a 3½-year term for theft and assault when the riot broke out during a Sunday morning service in the prison chapel. At the crown court hearing he had complained of years of inhumane treatment in the prison system. He had a string of convictions for petty crime and one for rape in 1984.

The judge said that Parliament had provided a maximum sentence of ten years, no doubt with the intention of deterring those who took the law into their own hands and also in the expectation that the maximum sentence would be invoked in an appropriate case. "In my judgment this is an appropriate case. I cannot imagine a worse," he said.

John Spencer, 30, from Manchester, was sentenced to eight years' imprisonment for riot. The judge told him that it was perfectly clear that he had played a full part and he added 18 months to the sentence for contempt of court because of Mr Spencer's part during a disturbance in the dock in the tenth week of the trial, during which the lives of jurors and their families were threatened.

Spencer will start his 9½-year term only after completing a sentence of seven years for robbery which was imposed two years ago. Andrew Nelson, 22, from Manchester, who was cleared of the rioting charge, was also jailed for 18 months for contempt. James Miller, 31, was sentenced to seven years for his part in the riot. The court was told that he had 26 previous convictions and that he had had no paid work since leaving school.

He was serving a four-year sentence for robbery and kidnapping imposed last April. His sentence for rioting will begin when the present sentence ends.

The judge told Miller that although he had been involved in the Strangeways riot for a limited time, during that period he had taken a full part and perpetrated the most revolting assault on one of the inmates of E wing, where sex offenders and prisoners held under rule 43 for their own protection were contained.

Tiny Doran, 24, of Bristol was jailed for four years for rioting. The judge said that he had not been one of the leaders of the disturbance and had possibly been led astray. The court had taken into account that Mr Doran had some finer feelings in helping one of the inmates to safety.

After the hearing Lillian Taylor, Paul Taylor's mother, was led weeping from the court by members of her family. Outside, television reporters and photographers were attacked.

Car boot customers entitled to refunds

By DAVID YOUNG

CAR boot sale enthusiasts now face a challenge as a new law means that if they cannot find a bargain, they could try to get their money back on faulty goods under the Sale of Goods Act.

Legal advisers to the Consumers' Association have said that, under certain circumstances, the act applies to goods bought at car boot sales, but that buyers should be prepared for a long slog if they want to claim their legal rights.

Keith Richards, a senior lawyer with the association, said: "Part of the fun of buying at car boot sales is being able to pick up anything that takes your fancy. The risk of buying a pig in a poke is part of that, but if you can find the vendor and you really want to go by the book, you might get your money back." He said that only if the seller made a false claim could a refund be sought.

"When you buy second-hand goods privately, the only legal requirement is that the seller owns the goods and that they correspond to any description given," he said. "You can try asking for a written description when you buy something, but remember it may prove difficult to track down a seller once you've found that the 'bargain' £10 stereo isn't in full working order."

Parents of stabbed girl given payment

A HEALTH authority has agreed to pay an undisclosed sum to the parents of a girl aged 11 who was stabbed to death in a shopping centre.

Emma Brodie died a year ago after Carol Barratt, 24, a psychiatric patient at a hospital in Doncaster, South Yorkshire, stabbed her in the town's Frenchgate shopping centre. An enquiry into the case found that the psychiatrist who allowed Barratt her freedom committed a serious error of professional judgment.

The amount that Doncaster health authority is paying to Rod and Val Brodie, both 38, of The Plough public house, Doncaster, is not being revealed. John Holt, representing the family, said that the authority did not accept legal liability but was paying the money because of "the unique circumstances" of the case.

Barratt was discharged half-way through a detention order imposed after she tried to attack another schoolgirl in the same shopping centre a few weeks earlier. Dr Neil Stewer, who authorised her release by telephone, was ordered to undergo six months' retraining before resuming his job.

Barratt is serving a life sentence at Rampton after admitting manslaughter on the ground of diminished responsibility.

Siege put prison reform on the political agenda

The disturbances at Strangeways led to a series of improvements in prison conditions and management, but the problem of overcrowding remains a big obstacle to reform, Richard Ford reports

The riot that engulfed Strangeways led not only to Britain's longest jail siege but also to proposals to improve conditions and management in prisons. For the first time this century, it forced the unfashionable area of penal reform on to the political agenda in a way that years of lobbying by pressure groups had failed to do.

The riot led to Lord Justice Woolf's report which made 12 recommendations for improvements. It criticised jail conditions and management and the failure of successive governments to fund the prison service adequately.

Within prisons, the riot was followed by a programme of improvements, including a £36 million scheme to end slopping out by 1994, a year earlier than recommended by Lord Justice Woolf, and the speeding up of a prison building programme. Routine censorship of mail was abolished except for Category A prisoners. Carphones were provided for inmates and more telephones were installed in an effort to help them to keep contact with family and friends.

The entitlement to visits was doubled from one a month to one a fortnight, the involvement of Boards of Visitors in disciplinary matters was ended and there are plans for an independent adjudicator to deal with prisoners' complaints. Some prisons have begun to introduce sentence planning in an attempt to give individual inmates an outline of how they will spend their time in jail and how they can develop their interests and education.

A national code of standards is being drawn up and is intended to create community jails, near big towns and cities, to help prisoners to maintain links with their families. The riot and the Woolf report gave impetus to community involvement in prisoners' resettlement, training, housing and employment. Whether that impetus can be maintained remains to be seen.

The effects within the Home Office and upon the management of the prison service were equally far-reaching. The riot, which led to disturbances in several other jails, caused a loss of ministerial confidence in prison management and fuelled moves to apply private sector skills to the running of jails.

Andrew Sampson, of the Prison Reform Trust, said: "The effect of Strangeways was to inject a sense of urgency into ministers about the need for change. It forced the whole area of prisons into the public arena."

After criticism of the lack of leadership by the prison department, Joe Pilling was made director-general of the prison service with the aim of improving public understanding of its work. The service is to become a semi-independent government agency as part of an effort to raise morale and to end the Home Office's day-to-day interference in the management of jails.

A criminal justice consultative council has been set up with the aim of improving co-operation between the judiciary, the legal profession, the prison and probation services and others involved in maintaining law and order. No body is sure whether it will become more than a talking shop.

In Parliament, the riot brought legislation creating an offence of prison mutiny, and the penalty for aiding a jail escape was increased from five to ten years' imprisonment.

Difficulties over meal times in some jails remain unresolved. Some prisoners have their last meal of the day as early as 4pm. This grievance is proving hard to resolve because it means tackling the shift system worked by prison officers.

The Home Office has not accepted the Woolf recommendation that a rule be introduced about jails holding more inmates than their official limits. The rule would have allowed 3 per cent overcrowding in a jail for up to seven days in any three months.

If this latitude was insufficient, the home secretary would have had to issue a certificate explaining why. Overcrowding remains a large obstacle to improving conditions.

Fall of a merchant prince shakes Italian business

ONE of the greatest merchant princes of Italian finance, Carlo De Benedetti, was convicted of fraud yesterday and sentenced to six years and four months' imprisonment for his role in the 1982 crash of Banco Ambrosiano, the Milan bank headed by the late Roberto Calvi. The business empire co-ordinated by De Benedetti includes a controlling share through his Compagnie Industriale Riunite holding company in the Italian newspaper La Repubblica.

The trial of financiers linked to the fall of Banco Ambrosiano was a postscript to a scandal that engulfed Italy's establishment, John Phillips writes

Due (P2) masonic lodge to which Calvi also belonged. Gelli, who refused to attend the trial because the authorities would not let him visit his wife who is ill in France, received a prison term of 18 years and six months.

The image of the Italian establishment has never recovered from the P2 affair, and some commentators believe the defeat of the Christian Democrats in the recent Italian general election was partly a delayed reaction against the political corruption the scandal has exposed since it emerged in 1981.

$250 million to Ambrosiano creditors as a goodwill gesture while insisting it was not to blame morally or legally for the spectacular failure.

The public prosecutor sought to bring to trial the former president of the institute, Archbishop Paul Marcinkus, an American, and two other former officials of the bank. But in 1988 the Italian Court of Cassation cancelled the indictments because of the sovereign status of the Vatican.

The Milan trial follows an eight-year investigation. The highest sentence went to Umberto Ortolani, a financier and a senior member of P2, who received 19 years in jail. The verdict in the Milan tribunal against De Benedetti, aged 57, and 32 others who were also found guilty has shocked the Italian business establishment. Shares in the Piedmontese financier's computer giant, Ing C. Olivetti & C. Spa, and his holding company Compagnie Industriali Riunite tumbled on the Milan stock exchange when the judges issued the sentence after a week of deliberation in the trial that opened in May 1990.

connection with Italy's biggest post-war bankruptcy was two months longer than the public prosecutor, Pier Luigi dell'Osso, had requested. However, he remained free after the sentence because under Italian law most people convicted of a crime do not have to start a prison term unless the conviction is confirmed by both an appeal court and the supreme court.

Marcinkus indictment had been cancelled

De Benedetti was deputy chairman of the Ambrosiano from November 1981 to January 1982 when he sold out his stake in what was formerly the largest private bank in Italy. He was not present at the court for the sentencing, under which he and the others convicted would be banned from managing public companies for ten years if the higher courts uphold the convictions.

Britain condemns Serb aggression

By MICHAEL BINYON, DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENT AND TIM JUDAH IN SARAJEVO

IN ONE of its strongest statements yet on Yugoslavia, Britain yesterday condemned the violence in Bosnia-Herzegovina as a deliberate attempt by Serbian extremists to undermine the republic's territorial integrity and destroy the constitution brokered by the European Community.

The Foreign Office said Serbian paramilitary units bore the main responsibility for bloodshed and for driving many innocent civilians from their homes. It also deplored the activities of the federal army, which it said had openly sided with terrorists instead of separating the warring factions.

"Serbia cannot expect a settled place in international institutions if it instigates civil war in Bosnia or the partition of that republic," the statement said.

Britain called for an immediate halt to the fighting, an end to outside interference and the return of the federal army to its barracks. The paramilitary groups should be disbanded, and all parties should renew their co-operation with the United Nations and Cyrus Vance, its special representative.

Further condemnation came from Germany and the United States, which want to punish Serbia by suspending Yugoslavia's seat at the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe. A German foreign ministry statement said James Baker, the American Secretary of State, and Hans-Dietrich Genscher, the German foreign minister, had reached agreement over the move. Herr Genscher had sent a five-point message to the EC demanding the suspension of the Yugoslav seat, held by the Serb-dominated rump state, if Serbia and the federal army do not change policy.

Shrugging off criticism, the Serb-led federal army crushed Muslim resistance in a key town in Bosnia-Herzegovina yesterday. Troops entered the predominantly Muslim city of Visegrad. Tanjug news agency reported. Overnight fighting was reported in Sarajevo, Foca, about 30 miles southeast of the Bosnian capital, and Mostar, inland from Croatia's Adriatic coast.

Mr Vance ruled out the dispatch of UN peacekeeping troops to Bosnia-Herzegovina. The former American Secretary of State, who yesterday began a series of meetings with Bosnia's ethnic leaders and the Yugoslav commander of the Yugoslav army, insisted that a solution could be found only through EC-sponsored talks.

The British statement drew attention to a radio interview given by Douglas Hurd on Wednesday, in which the foreign secretary spoke about past trade sanctions against Serbia. He said: "The Serbs know that they can't exist in isolation, that they are at the heart of Europe and there is no way in which they can survive or continue isolated, cut off from their neighbours." He said the West needed to use those facts "to bring them to reasonable behaviour in the republics of Yugoslavia".

The Foreign Office said that Croatian extremist groups shared the blame to a lesser extent, but the weight of its unusually forceful condemnation fell squarely on Serbia.

Fighting in Bosnia over the past month has led to 170,000 people fleeing their homes, according to the Sarajevo office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. "This is the largest, fastest-moving refugee situation since the Kurds fled," said Fabrizio Hochschild, a spokesman. "We are preparing for a quarter of a million refugees."

Paris: The Western European Union parliamentary assembly has urged the nine-nation defence group to send a peacekeeping force to Bosnia. The Maastricht treaty defined the WEU as the future defence arm of the EC. (Reuters)

Reaching out: a child holds out its hand as hooded men, leading the traditional Holy Week procession, pass by in Seville, where Expo '92 opens on Monday. The event, however, may be disrupted by a nationwide strike of hotel workers.

Unions launched a two-day strike yesterday and said further disruption during Expo and the summer Olympic games in Barcelona could not be ruled out if employers refused to renegotiate the 48-year-old national labour agreement.

'Kill the rich' rebels mourn death of terror

The end of communism and suspension of violence by urban terrorists has left Berlin's anarchists deprived of inspiration, Anne McElvoy writes

The huddle of leather jackets and Palestinian-style scarves around the metal tables of one of Kreuzberg's more disreputable cafes had the distinct look of a wake. Gloom was etched on the unshaven faces of Berlin's disenfranchised, many of whom sympathise openly with terrorism, after the announcement that the Red Army Faction was to suspend its 20-year campaign of violence.

Jens, sporting the popular "Kill the Rich" sticker, said: "They were our frontline warriors in the struggle against capitalism. They were the only force strong enough to shake up this rotten, self-satisfied society."

Others were debating whether there was a point in trying to fight "state violence" any longer now that even the professionals seem to be throwing in the bloody towel. Kreuzberg is preparing itself for the ritual May Day street battles between masked protesters called Autonomen, whose idea of a good day out entails throwing a petrol bomb followed by a bit of rough-and-tumble with the robust Berlin police.

The Autonomen are unlikely to renounce the thrill of living on the edge of the underworld, but since the collapse of communism, they looked like a bunch of rebels in search of an elusive cause. Anti-capitalist slogans have been replaced by a plethora of causes. "Against speculators - male or female" reads one daubed message from a politically-correct paintbrush.

Indifferent to their own country's politics, many have switched their focus to the plight of Turkey and joined the local anti-government faction. Look carefully and you can even find vintage graffiti from the glory years of the 1970s. "Free Astrid Proll" demands faded lettering near a disused station. A disrespectful hand has more recently added: "With every box of cornflakes."

At the squat that bears the name of the Office for the Organisation of Unexpected Events - a peculiarly testicular combination of anarchy and bureaucracy - there was no one at home. The organiser had no plans for spontaneous disruption, his girl friend said. He had recently taken up swimming.

The 15-person command of the Red Army Faction this week wrote to Bonn promising to renounce violence in return for a reduction in sentences of its longest-serving prisoners. Experts on terrorism said the move confirmed their impression of deep frustration within the movement at its failure to change German society.

Another group calling itself the Revolutionary Cells recently disbanded with a desperate farewell-to-arms letter: "We no longer feel that our efforts are worthwhile. Imperialist Germany has swallowed up socialist Germany, and the influence of capital is as brittle and absolute as ever."

Klaus Kinkel, the justice minister, has indicated that he is ready to take a softer line with prisoners in an attempt to break what he has called "the unhappy 20-year cycle" of atrocities prompting draconian sentences leading to further violence. He has let it be known that if the Red Army Faction ceases to organise attacks, some imprisoned terrorists could be freed on the ground that they would no longer be able to return to the underground.

The collapse of East Germany removed both an ideological inspiration and a safe haven. Ten wanted activists were found to be living under false names in the east. Many of them had cut sorry figures in court, saying they had put their violent pasts behind them and regretted their involvement. Their fate may have acted as a warning to today's urban guerrillas that terrorism and middle age do not mix.

The Red Army Faction attracted the alienated children of industrialists, bankers and politicians who had risen to social prominence in the 1960s. It exuded a potent, romantic appeal. In recent years the attacks became fewer, but the targets grander. The last victim, shot dead last Easter Monday, was Detlev Rohwedder, head of Treuhand, the agency responsible for privatisation in the East.

France cuts armed forces by a quarter

By MICHAEL EVANS, DEFENCE CORRESPONDENT

FRANCE yesterday followed the example of Britain and other Nato allies by announcing cuts in the French conscript army of up to 25 per cent, reducing manpower from 280,000 to 210,000 over the next five years. The equivalent of a division will be scrapped each year.

The reductions announced by Pierre Joxe, the French defence minister, will also affect the air force and navy, with a proposed cut in combat aircraft from 450 to fewer than 400 and the closure of several naval air bases.

The move by France echoes defence cuts already announced by many other Nato reducing the army by 25 per cent over the next three years, bringing the total down from 156,000 to 116,000. About 25,000 British troops will be staying in Germany.

Mr Joxe said that troops traditionally based near the German border would be redeployed and modernised for new missions. He said the Gulf war had underlined the need to increase the number of career soldiers in relation to conscripts. About 10,000 regular Foreign Legion troops were sent to the Gulf. More than half of next year's cuts will affect units made up mostly of conscripts, each of whom normally do a ten-month national service.

The defence ministry in Paris said cuts would affect 24,000 soldiers and 4,750 civilians working for the military next year. This year 15,000 military and 3,300 civilian jobs are going.

Next year's reductions will mainly affect French forces in Germany and northern and eastern France. An army corps based in the German town of Baden-Baden, an infantry division near Amiens in the north of France and an airbase at Strasbourg are to be dissolved.

Gilles de Robien, mayor of Amiens and a member of the conservative opposition, condemned the cuts as hasty at a time of instability in the former Soviet Union. "Lowering our guard seems precipitate and could make our country vulnerable," he said.

But in the week that Euro-Disney has deployed its battery of burgers, pizzas, pastas and the rest on the outskirts of Paris comes news that our Gallic neighbours are not exactly barricading themselves against the incursion of fast foods, frozen foods and foods that maman would never have let through the front door.

According to government researchers, French eating and drinking habits have changed profoundly over the past 20 years, to the point where they are now spending significantly more on

Raisa laments hard times

FROM JOANNA PITMAN IN TOKYO

RAISA Gorbachev, the former Soviet first lady who is in Japan with her husband at the end of a ten-day tour, appears to have enjoyed the sightseeing and shopping in Tokyo's department stores so much that she is loath to go home and resume a life of economic difficulties that affect the country.

Prompting visions of her queuing among Moscow's busy housewives for scraps of frozen cabbage, Mrs Gorbachev told the Yomiuri Shimbun that her family's housing, food and medical services have been drastically since Mikhail Gorbachev's resignation in December. "Our home is not immune to the economic problems plaguing our country," she said. Her daughter and son-in-law were looking for extra jobs "because their salaries as doctors are not enough to make ends meet".

However, thanks to her invitation to Japan by a committee headed by Yasuhiro Nakasone, the former prime minister, Mr and Mrs Gorbachev may now be in a position to ease their financial difficulties. For his participation in several conferences and his willingness to smile to television cameras on a visit to Tokyo Disneyland, Mr Gorbachev is being paid an undisclosed fee. Pravda estimated last week that Mr Gorbachev could earn $500,000 (£284,000) during the trip, but a spokesman for the Yomiuri Shimbun, one of the sponsors, denied this, saying only that a "moderate" sum would be paid.

But what is moderate by Japanese standards is likely to be colossal in the eyes of Mr Gorbachev's compatriots. Lucrative lecture tours have become the prerogative of former world leaders. Ronald Reagan, the former American president, still hangs on to his position at the top of the Japanese pecking order of retired leaders, and is said to have received up to $2 million for his tour.

Gallic barricades fall to a battery of burgers

FROM PHILIP JACOBSON IN PARIS

AS WE all know, the French like to eat, lesser breeds like to live, and respective national attitudes to the pleasures of wine underline the difference.

But in the week that Euro-Disney has deployed its battery of burgers, pizzas, pastas and the rest on the outskirts of Paris comes news that our Gallic neighbours are not exactly barricading themselves against the incursion of fast foods, frozen foods and foods that maman would never have let through the front door.

According to government researchers, French eating and drinking habits have changed profoundly over the past 20 years, to the point where they are now spending significantly more on frozen food at the supermarket than ever before. Less than 5 per cent of the average French shopping basket is now bought there.

As for strong drink, while the French still top the world consumption table, the amount of wine now consumed per capita has plunged by nearly a third to 31.7 litres a year.

About 20 per cent of the average French family's income now goes on food, which is sharply down over the past decade; perhaps the saving goes towards paying for the other national passions, looking good and taking long, exotic holidays.

It is a pleasure to report, however, that all is not turned upside down in the land of serious gastronomy. Whatever the allure of fast foods and soft drinks in front of the telly, the French still regard eating out as one of the hallmarks of a truly mature civilisation, and they go at it with such gusto that the share of their budget devoted to restaurants has all but doubled to over 19 per cent during the past ten years. Hokey for them and long may it last: one does not go to live in Paris to be confronted with fast foods, nor, come to that, to be haunted by faddists giving warnings about the dangers posed by a richly bourgeois diet. Did we not read lately of the extraordinary good health enjoyed by the good people of Gascony, who were practically weaned on foie gras?

Is it permissible for an exile to add, in conclusion, that whatever the French do or do not eat, they appear to thrive on it. Without a statistic to hand, one would still feel safe in asserting that there are far fewer overweight and pasty people on the streets of France than there are on the other side of the Channel.

Russia votes to change name again

FROM ASSOCIATED PRESS IN MOSCOW

THE Russian parliament voted yesterday to change the name of the country from the Russian Federation to Russia, the third name change since August.

President Yeltsin and some of his aides had proposed retaining the name Russian Federation, as the country has been known since the Soviet collapse last year. Before then the country was called the Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic, one of the 15 Soviet republics.

After 25 minutes of debate the Congress of People's Deputies voted 871 to 30, with 30 abstentions, to amend the constitution to make the name "Rossiya" in Russian.

WE DON'T JUST TELL YOU

Support for populist billionaire alarms Bush and Clinton

FROM MARTIN FLETCHER
IN WASHINGTON

THE Wall Street Journal has never been an enemy of multimillionaires. Nevertheless, the newspaper carried two columns of letters yesterday from readers outraged by a columnist's disparagement of Ross Perot, the Texas billionaire who is likely to run for president this year.

Mr Perot was "the best hope this nation has to fix an economic mess neither party can correct", wrote John Clark of New York. "If our political leadership is hellbent on taking us off the financial cliff, it may be somewhat better to know that the Texas billionaire is in the saddle," declared Robert Ferguson of Virginia.

R.J. McCroarty of North Carolina spoke of a "gigantic swell of hope" since Mr Perot came forward. "His candidacy taps a latent energy that will bring about a change in American politics approaching the collapse of the USSR. Just wait and see. Even though it's not visible from the Potomac, it is clear elsewhere.

The strength of Mr Perot's populist challenge is, in fact, becoming increasingly apparent in Washington. Two polls yesterday showed one in four Americans backing him even before he has begun campaigning.

Commentators now talk of his being the strongest, independent presidential bid since Theodore Roosevelt won 27 per cent as a Progressive in 1912, and do not dismiss an outright victory.

The Republican and Democratic hierarchies contend with some justification that Mr Perot's support can only diminish as the electorate learns more about him. He has only the vaguest programme for government, no political experience and no national machine. What he does have, however, is that rare ability for a billionaire to tap into the ordinary American's present rage, an image as patriot and self-made businessman of almost mythical proportions, and the ability to spend more money than President Bush and Bill Clinton combined.

He has pledged to spend $100 million ($57 million) or "whatever it takes" on his campaign. "The potential is mindboggling," Bob Beckel, the Democratic consultant who ran Walter Mondale's 1984 presidential campaign, said. "You could reach virtually every disaffected voter and the others could only stand by and watch. You could also buy up a whole swathe of commercial air time in October to make it difficult for the others to find any good time."

Mr Perot says his supporters must get him on the ballot in all 50 states before he will agree to stand, but few now doubt that he will formally declare in June. A survey in The Washington Post yesterday gave him 23 per cent support, just one point behind Mr Clinton with Mr Bush on 37. A Wall Street Journal poll gave him 26 per cent to Mr Clinton's 30 and Mr Bush's 38.

The White House fears Mr Perot will siphon off critical support for Mr Bush in the key electoral states of Texas and California, but the Journal poll, the most comprehensive yet, contains warnings for both parties. It shows he has support in all regions and is beating Mr Clinton in the west, draws votes from Mr Clinton and Mr Bush, and enjoys more support among independent voters than the other two combined.

Lieutenant General Mohamed Mohamed, the army's Chief of Staff, said the Buffalo DHCS's left engine had cut out and the crew had attempted to make an emergency landing. García charged on arms

FROM AFP
IN LIMA

ALAN García, the former Peruvian president who has been in hiding since his successor dissolved parliament and suspended the constitution 11 days ago, will be charged with illegal arms possession, the interior ministry has announced.

The prosecutor handling the case has been authorised to file similar charges against Agustín Mantilla Campos, the former interior minister, who like Señor García is a member of the opposition American Popular Revolutionary Alliance.

But President Fujimori told Japanese reporters late on Wednesday that "there is no arrest order for political opposition members" including Señor García and Carlos García y García, Peru's second vice-president, a Christian evangelist, who has taken refuge in the Argentine embassy here.

Officials have said they searched Señor Mantilla Campos's house and found weapons and ammunition usually reserved for use by the police and armed forces.

The former president is to be charged with "illegal possession and use of firearms for the Aprista party," the interior ministry said, referring to the local name for Señor García's party.

He faced corruption charges after his five-year presidential term ended in 1990. The charges were dropped in January and he since has become an outspoken opposition leader.

He has been a staunch critic of President Fujimori's decision on April 5 to dissolve congress, suspend the constitution and order some opposition leaders to be held temporarily under house arrest. The former president so far has eluded house arrest, and has issued statements saying he would head a civilian resistance to President Fujimori's military-backed rule by decree.

Señor Fujimori has defended his own move, saying it was necessary for him to fight drug trafficking and clamp down on rebels.

Zimbabwe reduced to 16 days' maize supply

FROM MICHAEL HARTNACK IN HARARE

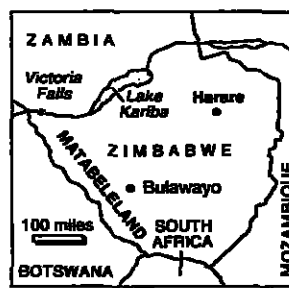

PRESIDENT Mugabe plans modest celebrations of the 12th anniversary of Zimbabwe's independence this weekend as the country endures its worst ever food shortage after the failure of the annual rains.

An official of Mr Mugabe's ruling Zanu (PF) party reported that at Chigorongwa village in the remote Zombe area of the midlands, shocked neighbours offered their scanty food reserves to try to persuade a starving family not to eat their dog, which they had roasted. Dog meat is taboo. In other areas people are reportedly trying to fill their bellies with river silt and the ground up pods of babab (cream of tartar) trees, or wild grasses.

South African help is on the way, in the form of two trains a day from the port of Durban, each carrying 700 tonnes of maize, but Zimbabwe's 10 million people consume an estimated 4,000 tonnes a day. Only 16 days supply is thought to remain in silos.

Yesterday there were the customary scenes at supermarkets as housewives scrambled for limited supplies of maize meal, sugar, cooking oil and margarine. Money raised for independence celebrations will be diverted to relieve distress, officials have promised. Joshua Nkomo, the vice-president, has reportedly cancelled plans to address an independence day rally in his home city, Bulawayo, as public discontent with the government threatens to spill over.

Mr Mugabe's sister, Sabina Mugabe, once the most fanatically loyal of ruling party backbenchers, voiced many people's fears when she told parliament last week: "The problem is that we started lying, saying there is a lot of maize coming. We do not know how to lie to them this time."

Decorative lights illuminating the top of the Helmsley-managed Empire State building in New York were turned off on the orders of billionaire Harry Helmsley to mark his wife's first night behind bars. Leona Helmsley, 71, arrived at a minimum-security prison by limousine and private jet, entering through the back gates to begin a four-year sentence for tax evasion. Mr Helmsley, 83, said that turning off the lights was a "symbolic gesture". He also ordered that the lights be switched off at Helmsley Building, which is covered in gold leaf, on New York's Park Avenue.

Japan seeks role as Earth's defender

FROM JOANNA PITTMAN IN TOKYO

Long portrayed by foreign conservationists as an economic Attila the Hun, pillaging the world's rain forests and destroying marine life, Japan is now seeking a new role as a leader on the environment. As 160 nations prepare for June's Earth summit in Brazil, the Japanese are trying to cast themselves as progressives, and the rest of the developed world as Luddites, on the key issues of slowing global warming and providing ecological help to developing countries.

This week, Noboru Takeshita, the former Japanese prime minister, has been hosting a conference of current and former world leaders on environmental aid. A much trumpeted "Tokyo Declaration" is to be issued today proposing an environmental tax on developed nations and a diversion of military spending to an environmental protection fund of $125 billion (£70 billion).

Noting Japan's traditional devotion to industrialisation, sceptics are questioning the extent of Japanese conviction. Bureaucratic bickering and political inertia are likely to block environmental initiatives at home, and the nation has a thin record to point to in leading the world over ecological issues.

One exception has been Japan's policy on capping carbon dioxide emissions, a development that has been initiated and developed by industry in conjunction with the ministry of international trade and industry. Due to the increased energy efficiency of Japan's cars, the country's per capita carbon emission level is now half the American rate.

When making a cleaner engine coincides with cutting costs, environmental consciousness in Japan is easy. But when economic viability is threatened, the environment tends to lose out, largely because for lack of a proper environmental protection movement.

When the government set up the environmental agency in 1970, it answered the fears of the ministry of trade and industry by ensuring that it would lack the clout of a full-scale ministry. Without prestige, sufficient staff or a clear mandate, the agency has had limited influence. Government ministries have been able to draft and implement policy in cahoots with private sector groups.

Japan is also ill-equipped to cope with the ecological issues that have emerged in recent years because, to its well-intentioned but politically impotent citizen-activist groups and to bureaucrats, "environment" usually means "anti-pollution", and a preoccupation with human health has meant a neglect of broader issues.

Born to go shopping

Charles Bremner on the woes of teenage consumers

Like 20th-century America seems to be putting an end to the idea of childhood, and the present generation of teenage Americans is having a miserable time.

Quite simply, American children are being treated as adults from the age of 13, while their parents and society as a whole have taken to behaving like children. Youngsters are surely not being given peace to learn when a country drops the words boy and girl as damaging to self-esteem and insists they be called young men and women. (Even toddlers are called "kindergarten students" these days.) The "pre-adults" are then asked to contend with an adult generation which flaunts its emotional turmoil, whining endlessly not only in front of their offspring but throughout the media about their failings and troubles.

Perhaps this was an inevitable result of the affluence which came to America in the 1950s, bringing with it the teen culture and then the explosion of divorce, but youngsters in America are now exposed to extraordinary pressure to spend and consume, while at the same time being confronted with evils and ills unimaginable even to the rocking rebels of the sixties.

Take the average American high school, usually a red brick building in a comfortable suburb. The parking lot is packed with cars because all but the poor drive themselves to school after the age of 16 or 17. As for dress, teenagers rich and poor follow an extravagant fashion code worthy of a medieval court. Patrick Welsh, an English teacher in an ordinary Virginia school lamented the compulsive consumerism in The Washington Post, noting that 80 per cent of his pupils had television sets, telephones and stereo sets in their bedrooms, and that some had videos. A school counsellor said the way American parents now lavish wealth rather than discipline on the young is creating a generation of "teenage monsters".

In a glowing account of the new "13-going-on-21" generation, Adweek magazine recently observed teenagers in Kansas City and found them to be "chic, yet socially committed, cost-conscious yet upscale in their tastes, fun-loving yet environmentally concerned and every bit as complicated as their parents". The feature was intended to help marketing people attract the $60 billion per year spent by American school students, most of it in the regional shopping malls. These institutions, which multiplied in the late 1970s and 1980s, are the centre of life for millions of "mall rats", teenagers who rarely spend time elsewhere, and develop a condition known as "mall eyes". The average schoolgirl spends $306 a year on cosmetics alone, and 93 per cent of teenage girls say shopping is their favourite pastime.

While children are busy fighting the consumer wars, they enjoy none of the protection from the uglier side of life afforded to earlier generations. Her Manhattan school gave my 15-year-old daughter one project for the Easter holidays: prepare a presentation on sexually transmitted diseases. Aids education is essential, given that most American teenagers have sex before 17. Precociousness seems to have reached new levels with news this week of the criminal indictment of two seven-year-olds in Indianapolis for rape, and the trial in Washington state of a 10-year-old on charges that he raped five little girls.

Worry extends far beyond disease and the violence of inner city schools where gun detectors have had to be installed at entrances. Thanks to the violence, both emotional and physical, of the popular culture, the cares of the world weigh on the shoulders of the current teenagers. The nuclear shadow may have been lifted, and America may enjoy a peace and prosperity unknown in human history, but the average teenager will tell you the world is close to destruction. My daughter and her friends lose sleep over everything from the threat to the environment to racism, issues which are endlessly debated in their classes, magazines and on TV.

Many parents believe things have gone too far and are campaigning for a restoration of childhood and an end to the overload of information. "Kids know too much too soon," says Gary Bauer, president of the Family Research Council. He and leaders of similar groups agree that the fault lies entirely with parents who have failed to impart a sense of security and values to their young.

Giving way at the centre

Sir Leon Brittan: positive role for the UK

The French opposition is demanding a referendum. Germany's upper house threatens a veto unless the rights of the Länder are respected. Ireland is in the throes of a complicated wrangle over abortion. The Danes are bracing themselves for a large "no" vote. Almost everywhere — except in Britain — the treaty of Maastricht is in trouble. Ratification, taken for granted by European leaders as they toasted agreement four months ago, is suddenly sucking them into a vortex of doubt, debate and opposition.

Britain's senior commissioner in Brussels has, however, warned those watching the turmoil on the continent with Schadenfreude that they are deluding themselves. Maastricht will be ratified, Sir Leon Brittan said yesterday. Neither the Gaullist opposition nor the ruling socialist party in France wants the treaty to collapse. The same is true of Germany, he said: whatever the doubts about monetary union and the powers of the 16 states, no German wants to turn his back on Europe. The continental debate is an attempt to find an equilibrium, as John Major's government successfully managed before Maastricht.

Nor, Sir Leon adds, would a failure to ratify the treaty do anything but harm to Britain. It would stall all momentum in the Community. It would ruin the chances of completing the single market by the end of this year. It would scupper British plans for a rapid widening of EC membership. It would be "wholly contrary to British interests".

Sir Leon detects no tendency by the new Conservative government to gloat at the difficulties of European leaders in selling the treaty to their voters — although the same is not true of the press. He wants Britain to seize the unique opportunity a strong, new government, soon to hold the EC presidency, has to exercise positive influence. "This can be perfectly legitimately exercised in favour of Europe that is internally non-interventionist and externally open to the outside world, accommodating to new members," he adds. "The opportunity to move in that direction is there for the asking." He cites the recent banking directives, the crackdown on state aid, and the reinforcement of competition policy to show that Brussels is moving away from a Fortress Europe mentality. The Commission is no longer attempting to prop up ailing European industries with huge subsidies; instead industrial policy now focuses upon the training of individuals.

Sir Leon does not deny the cooling of enthusiasm on the continent for the Maastricht treaty. He also sees the danger of pro-European policies, long entrenched in most states, being rejected by voters along with their governments. Ten years ago this could have hurt the Community. But now, he says, the idea of Europe has a life of its own, even after the collapse of the common communist enemy, and it will survive such changes at the polls.

With the lawyer's cautious enthusiasm which allowed him to play a vital role in tempering Conservative opposition to treaties on economic and political union, Sir Leon says Britain could take advantage of the shift in attitudes to push the Community into more open policies. To do so, however, it must demonstrate its commitment to Maastricht, show that it believes in the Community and that it wishes to be at its centre. "The question as always should not be how keep we are on the European Community, but what kind of European Community do we wish to be kept on."

He sees a Europe now poised to develop in ways much closer to the British vision than many people in Britain realised. All members now accept the case for wider membership, although suspicions linger that British enthusiasm is still partly based on a wish to dilute the federalist influence. All are willing to make a go of the new Maastricht intergovernmental arrangements for foreign and defence policy, which leaves the initiative with member states and denies Brussels any legislative monopoly.

On one vital question Sir Leon is now willing to go a long way to answer doubts in Britain, and increasingly on the continent, over his own and his fellow commissioners' powers. He says it is time the Commission began handing back powers to the member states. To give meaning to the concept of subsidiarity, Brussels should allow national governments to recapture the right to make their own laws in all kinds of fields. He has not discussed this with fellow commissioners, but gives the regulation of drinking water as an example. This would deal with people's prime anxiety about the Community: the ratchet effect, automatically drawing ever greater power to Brussels.

Commission ebb and flow, says, should be a balance. Brussels must have a say now in economic and monetary union, whereas 15 years ago this would have been ridiculous. But on other matters it should show that it has the self-confidence to give back powers it has accumulated.

Sir Leon, who would have resigned had Labour won power, is likely to stay on in Brussels for at least two more years, and possibly for another term after that. Already he is regarded as the most influential commissioner after Jacques Delors. He is also likely to remain an influence in Downing Street, where his latest suggestion will find ready support.

Echoing the prime minister's own wish for harmony in Britain, he said yesterday: "I hope the new Europe will not need to feel so interventionist and that the principle of subsidiarity will be given real effect. I hope the new Europe will be sufficiently at peace with itself not to feel that it does not exist unless it pokes its nose into everything."

The face of innocent suffering

The horror and cruelty of Good Friday must continue to disturb Christians, says Daniel Johnson

On Palm Sunday this year, our young priest organised a Passion play for the little children of the parish. Up the altar steps they trooped: the small boy who played Jesus wore a white surplice to be scourged and crucified; the Evangelist, a little girl, told the story in a clear, bell-like voice. Good Friday lends itself to the stage.

Yet the thought crossed my mind during this touching spectacle that the child-actors could have no inkling of what it was that they were commemorating. Could not our priest be accused of exploiting their innocence for the edification of adults, not unlike an impresario who uses a child for ignominious purposes?

The story of Good Friday tells of mass hysteria and official callousness, of unimaginable cruelty and suffering, of a son who beseeches his omnipotent father for mercy but is left to die. Had it not happened, the story would be an obscenity. Those who believe that it never happened, or at any rate not as the gospels tell it, are inclined to treat the story as a satirical fantasy. Christians who take their faith seriously cannot but be troubled by Good Friday more than any other day in their calendar.

In art, in literature and in music, the Crucifixion has undergone many transformations: it is easy to forget that there was a time when Christ was practically never represented on the Cross. In late Roman and Byzantine art, which influenced Western Europe so profoundly until at least the 13th century, Christ was commonly shown as a king or judge, as ruler of the universe (pantocrator).

It is tempting to suppose that during the late Middle Ages, artists espoused the Crucifixion as a subject because the barbaric plague had evoked a morbid fascination with death. More important, though, must have been the individualism of the period. Man's rediscovery of his own humanity burgeoned into the cosmology and culture of the Renaissance, and collapsed into the civil war of Christendom we call the Reformation.

The crucified Saviour was the symbol of a Europe chastened by its own sinfulness, yet still inspired by celestial visions. Over the years from 1350 to 1700 falls the shadow of the Cross: from Donatello to Tintoretto, from Grünewald to Bach. Go to the V & A to see Donatello's Lamentation over the Dead Christ, or visit Florence to see his wooden Crucifix at Santa Croce, or the pulpit at San Lorenzo, with its relief of the Agony in the Garden, Deposition and Entombment. The sculptor's horror at the deed is palpable, yet softened by pity for the all too human victim — a "peasant", as Brunelleschi said of Donatello's model. One's breath is taken away as one enters the room filled by Tintoretto's Crucifixion in the Scuola di San Rocco in Venice. But it is a vision of justifying humanity, as if the whole of Jerusalem had come to see the show!

With Grünewald's altarpiece of Isenheim at Colmar, Christ's death means the light of the soul, bathed in a greenish lunar light, the emaciated and dislocated body of the Crucified looms over his distraught mother and Mary Magdalene, while the ghost of John the Baptist points grimly at the scene.

Bach's passions achieve a kind of consolation. But it is the consolation of attending to suffering in death. In the St Matthew Passion, when the gigantic final chorus dies away on a deep bass note, it is as though the secular world were being closed about our heads. The earnest desire of the chorus for "mein Jesu" is to bury him.

Durer's Christ on the Cross: the image of the crucifixion has undergone many changes

Not pain but pleasure, not the transcendent but the natural, not God become flesh but defiled humanity was the watchword. So much so that the 19th century, of doubt, looked back over its shoulder with yearning, fearing the prospect of an entirely godless future.

Not the countless atheists and agnostics, but two Christians — one Protestant, one Catholic — sum up the deepest thinking about the Cross of that time. Søren Kierkegaard and John Henry Newman both meditated all their lives on Christ's self-sacrifice.

Kierkegaard rejected the "romantic" view of the Crucifixion, which "accentuates the fullness of the suffering, Christ's delicate body which suffers so prodigiously; or it accentuates... the fact that He who was holy, the purest and most innocent of all, had to suffer. The paradox is that Christ came into the world in order to suffer."

Sublime as the image of the Crucifixion in Western art became during the millennium of faith, the 18th century, the age of reason, averted its gaze from the divine corpse on the Cross.

Others who suffer do so for a higher purpose: only for Christ Himself, he thought, is suffering itself the purpose. The pseudo-religiosity of Wagner's Parsifal, with its sumptuous Good Friday music, shows the danger of pursuing this paradox too far: suffering for its own sake can become blasphemy.

Newman was less enamoured of paradox, but he was if anything more disturbed by the enormity of the Crucifixion. In a sermon preached on Good Friday some 150 years ago, he compared Christ's suffering to that of dumb animals and little children, whose defencelessness provides an analogy. "What if wicked men took and crucified a young child? What if they deliberately seized his poor little frame and stretched out its arms, nailed them to a cross bar of wood, drew a stake through its two feet, and fastened them to a beam, and so left it to die? It is almost too shocking to say; perhaps, you will actually say it is too shocking, and ought not to be said. O my brethren, you feel the horror of this, and yet you can bear to read of Christ's sufferings without horror?"

How much less horror does Good Friday inspire today than even a century ago. Perhaps the intervening years have so much reduced the capacity of mankind to feel horror and compassion that Newman's appeal is no longer sufficient. Yet if the events of Good Friday can seem less extraordinary, those of Easter must seem even more so.

Christ's Passion cannot be seen in isolation from His Resurrection. Christians who demote the Resurrection from the historical to the symbolic plane — who, in Kierkegaard's mocking phrase, consider Christianity "to a certain degree true" — are honour-bound to come to grips with Good Friday.

If Christ did not rise from the dead, what was His suffering for? If He was not God, why did God let Him suffer so? With His hideous pitilessness, the Crucifixion is powerful enough to unravel Christianity — unless it is understood as the necessary prelude to Easter.

ALAN COREN

You will groan (and who could blame you?) to recall my obsessive search, passion for a Crickwood hero. So let me lift your spirits: the search is over. After today, you will hear no more of it. Even if other local prodigies turn up as unexpectedly as this one, they shall not test your patience. I am satisfied, now, to let the matter rest, along with the blessed remains of a paragon whose ineffable righteousness for me and Crickwood sets her immovably above any putative contender.

Heroine, then. And those remains lie not 200 yards from my very gate, though I didn't know this until yesterday, despite having passed them unperceived times on as many short cuts through the cemetery at the top of the road. But yesterday's was a long cut: as I negotiated the wonky crosses, April suddenly did what April suddenly does, so I shot under a maple tree to wait for it to stop doing it. I was not alone, for that is the way it is in graveyards, but I did not immediately spot who was beside me, because the moss lay thick in the chisellings. It was only when I thought I saw what I subsequently knew I had that I ran my finger down the grooves to read the date, and read: "In loving memory of Marie Lloyd, born February 12, 1870, died October 7, 1922."

Even then, and even as the fingers trembled, I couldn't be sure it was her — that her, I mean. And then I read the mottled verse beneath:

Tired she was, and she wouldn't show it.
Suffering she was, and hoped we didn't know it.
But He who loved her knew it, understanding all.
Prescribed long rest, and gave the final call.

Who else could it be? You could hear her singing that first couplet, and anyone who knew anything about Marie Lloyd knew the significance of the second, because she died in the middle of her act at the Edmontons Empire, in the middle, indeed, of "One of the Ruins that Cromwell Knocked About a Bit". Furthermore, she died because she had been knocked about more than a bit by her swine of a third husband, jockey Bernard Dillon, and (since even with all that, irony remained unsatisfied) she died staggering as if drunk, but because the song required her to stagger as if drunk, the audience laughed and cheered while she terminally tottered. I do not know if He, understanding all, fixed it so that the last sound she heard was of an enraptured music hall, you would have to ask a believer, but there have been worse ways to go.

When the shower eased, I walked across the cemetery office, and Cliff Green, who runs it, took down the book for 1922, and showed me an entry no less apt in its macabre comedy than the final call itself, in that Matilda Alice Victoria Dillon, known as Marie Lloyd, had been interred 12 ft down, for £52 2s 0d, and wink the other eye.

that her mother Matilda Wood had been interred above her (9 ft) in 1931, and her father above her (7 ft) in 1940, and her sister above him (4 ft) in 1968, and just as I had seemed to hear her sing before, now I seemed hear her laugh, and I knew that laugh. I had heard it countless times on the wheezy old 78 I replay whenever I need a little of what I fancy to do me good, and Mr Green said there was one more thing I might like to know, which is that both gates of Fortune Green Cemetery had been opened only once, and that was on October 12, 1922.

It was the biggest funeral they had ever had, and they had been compelled to close those same gates an hour before the burial, because all three local police stations couldn't provide enough constables to control the weeping mob, and it was no good drafting in volunteers because, as you know, you can't trust a special like the old-time coppers.

Marie Lloyd, however, despite the dilly-dallying of the cortege from her house in Woodstock Road as the result of so many wreaths being hung at the cars by grieving bystanders that the half-mile journey took almost an hour, did, at last, find her way home, and I rejoice that it's just a step across the road from me. Tonight I shall put on "A Little of What You Fancy", turn up the volume, and open the windows for her to hear.

And if you remind me I'm not a believer, I shall, like Marie, just wink the other eye.

JOHN MAJOR will enjoy his first full day off since the election today with his family in Huntingdon. Apart from a fleeting visit last weekend, it is the first time he has returned to his constituency since the election.

Norma has stocked up the larder for the occasion with the local Tesco supermarket since the election. Peter Brown, the Huntingdon Tory agent, says: "It will be nice to have John among us again. We are not planning any celebrations, although we hope we might see something of him." In truth, time will be short. After being reunited in Huntingdon with Norma and the children, James and Elisabeth, Major will tomorrow take them on to Chequers, where they are due to be joined by Norma's mother, known as Nan.

Neil Kinnock, who might have been expected to spend his first weekend in Chequers, will pass the weekend pottering around the garden of his Ealing home. "He is having a rest," said one of his aides. "The family is not planning to go away."

Faddy Ashdown, who travelled more miles than any other leader on the campaign trail, is away from home yet again, with his wife Jane. They are relaxing at their cottage in France.

Many of the new ministers will take the opportunity to jet off to sunnier climes. David Mellor, the new Secretary of State for National Heritage — dubbed the minister of fun — was not, as one might expect, sampling the cultural delights of Britain. "He has gone off in pursuit of a warmer temperature," says his office.

The contenders for the Labour leadership were also planning one last chance to relax. Bryan Gould is spending his Easter at home. "We thought we were going to be at Maastricht with civil servants causing to our every need. As it is, we are thrust into a leadership contest and we will have a few hours rest before heading for the Scottish TUC," says his office.

John Smith is also off to Scotland to spend the holiday climbing Scottish munros. He has so far climbed 78 of the 277, after setting himself a target of 100 by the general election. Having failed in that ambition, he has extended his deadline until the leadership election in July.

The ministry of fun has acquired another nickname. It is now being referred to in Whitehall as the bastion ministry: Broadcasting, Art, Sport, Television, Architecture, Recreation and Drama.

Appeal

FORGET CANALETTO. A far better known part of Britain's heritage is threatened with export. The bells of Shoreditch — the ones commemorated by generations of children in the nursery rhyme "Oranges and Lemons" — may soon be on their way to Canada or Australia.

The 12 bells, the oldest of which dates back to 1739, hang in St Leonard's Church in the parish of Shoreditch, and they are being replaced. Number ten in particular is in a sorry state, with an irreparably large crack. "It sounds horrible," says Alan Reagan, zeppole-keeper at St Leonard's. The most badly damaged of the bells are to be recast, and an entirely new ring should be in place by the end of the year, pending the church's blessing.

The original bells are likely to end up in Toronto, or the Antipodes where they would join an equally famous ring, the bells of St Martin's, which are now calling the faithful to prayer in Perth. A suitable case for the new musical Andrew Lloyd Webber is threatening?

Now I've grown rich, say the bells of Shoreditch.

They all wanted to know, but Chris Patten was not in the mood for answering questions about his future when he appeared at a Central Office party on Wednesday night before flying off to Hong Kong.

Chinese whispers

THEY all wanted to know, but Chris Patten was not in the mood for answering questions about his future when he appeared at a Central Office party on Wednesday night before flying off to Hong Kong.

Some 70 party workers were queuing champagne when the chairman arrived with his wife, Lavender, and two of their three daughters, Laura and Alice. Perhaps Patten was lost for words in the presence of Norman Lamont, Michael Howard, Gillian Shephard, Richard Ryder and Michael Portillo, all safely returned to the Commons and the cabinet, but he came and went within half an hour, with a kiss for Bray and a cheery wave.

Yet the affection which greeted him was born of more than sympathy. The same day the chairman had sent staff a letter congratulating them on their election effort. "The professionalism that you all showed playing a significant part in enabling the party to achieve such a historic victory," he wrote. "That wasn't the entire reason for the large grins, however. Patten had also generously agreed, in spite of the party's debts, to give everyone at Smith Square merit bonuses of up to 10 per cent of their annual salaries."

Newcastle upon Tyne is not, perhaps, the obvious place for an Easter break — but what if someone else plays for the petrol? That is just what Bill Paisley, general manager of the Copthorne Hotel on Tyneside is offering to do in an attempt to lure soft southerners to the land of Gaia. Recession, depression and inner city decay are alien concepts to carefree Georgians living in the thriving city, says Paisley somewhat unconvincedly. "I want to remind recession hit southerners what a buoyant economy is like," he says. Paisley is offering Depressed of Tunbridge Wells or Suicidal of Streatham £50 to cover two tanks of petrol. And what if they prefer to let the South take the strain? "OK. They can have the £50 towards the train fare."

LABOUR A

Labour's prime anxiety about the Community: the ratchet effect, automatically drawing ever greater power to Brussels.

Others who suffer do so for a higher purpose: only for Christ Himself, he thought, is suffering itself the purpose. The pseudo-religiosity of Wagner's Parsifal, with its sumptuous Good Friday music, shows the danger of pursuing this paradox too far: suffering for its own sake can become blasphemy.

Newman was less enamoured of paradox, but he was if anything more disturbed by the enormity of the Crucifixion. In a sermon preached on Good Friday some 150 years ago, he compared Christ's suffering to that of dumb animals and little children, whose defencelessness provides an analogy. "What if wicked men took and crucified a young child? What if they deliberately seized his poor little frame and stretched out its arms, nailed them to a cross bar of wood, drew a stake through its two feet, and fastened them to a beam, and so left it to die? It is almost too shocking to say; perhaps, you will actually say it is too shocking, and ought not to be said. O my brethren, you feel the horror of this, and yet you can bear to read of Christ's sufferings without horror?"

How much less horror does Good Friday inspire today than even a century ago. Perhaps the intervening years have so much reduced the capacity of mankind to feel horror and compassion that Newman's appeal is no longer sufficient. Yet if the events of Good Friday can seem less extraordinary, those of Easter must seem even more so.

Christ's Passion cannot be seen in isolation from His Resurrection. Christians who demote the Resurrection from the historical to the symbolic plane — who, in Kierkegaard's mocking phrase, consider Christianity "to a certain degree true" — are honour-bound to come to grips with Good Friday.

LABOUR AND CLASS ENVY

Can Labour Win? and Must Labour Lose? were the titles of two bleak books published in 1960, after Labour had lost three elections in a row. Now the same questions are being asked after a run of four defeats. They should be exercising the Labour party members, MPs and trade unionists who are entrusted with electing the right combination of leader and deputy leader in July.

Anthony Crosland's Can Labour Win? predicted a 2 per cent decline in Labour's vote at each election unless "Labour can present itself as a progressive, national, social democratic party". His prophecy would have given Labour a 28 per cent share of the vote in 1987, a target it hit one election early. Must Labour Lose? included a commentary by Rita Hinden concluding that crumbling class solidarity, the declining appeal of public ownership and divisions within the party made defeat inevitable.

Crosland was right only after 1983, when Labour started the long haul back towards becoming a modern social democratic party, did voters start to return. Its share rose to 31 per cent in 1987 and 35 per cent earlier this month, as it moved towards the centre ground. But Labour has not yet gone far enough towards becoming a progressive, national, classless party. A glance at the post-election map, with its blue swathe across the South and zones of red in the North and Scotland diminishes Labour's claim to represent equally all parts of the nation. And the party is still over-reliant on votes from the young and the public sector together with its traditional, dwindling, cloth-cap support.

Becoming a social democratic party rather than a party of "labour" means shedding the class affiliations that pit one set of voters against another. It was her cross-class appeal that made Margaret Thatcher successful, and until Labour starts winning more votes from the lower middle classes and those who aspire to them, its base will be too small to deprive the Tories of victory.

In this lay the flaw in John Smith's pre-election shadow budget, which aimed to soak the "rich" (for which read middle-class) and to sprinkle the drops (very thinly) among all those who were either retired or had children. Given that the old were disproportionately inclined towards the Tories in this election, even the potential recipients of such largesse were not grateful. But, more important, what the election showed was that many people earning less than the critical £21,060 still disapproved of the proposed higher levels of taxation of larger incomes. To them, the policy looked spiteful.

Labour has failed to respond to the changing aspirations of the British. In the 1980s the Conservative achievement was to make those born working class feel comfortable about wanting to move up in society. Britain may not yet be as socially fluid as America, but the class system is no longer frozen in ice.

Labour's policies still seem to presuppose a socially static society, where deprivation and social injustice can be corrected only by redistribution organised by government. Thus has Labour inadvertently cast itself as an enemy of social mobility. Yet inequality will strike society as unfair, demanding government correction, only if those who suffer from it are its powerless victims with no other remedies available to them. This is why the equality that really matters today is equality of opportunity.

Hence Labour must at last abandon its central policy of redistribution by punitive progressive taxation. It need not worry that if it does so, there will be nothing left to fight over. Politicians will still debate the desirable balance between tax levels and public expenditure, and more radically, perhaps, the extent to which economic and fiscal policy should take into account the social and environmental consequences of market forces.

Whoever wins the Labour leadership election must prepare his party for the next general election by recognising that the world has changed. The politics of envy have lost their potency. Labour need not lose, but it has to find new friends all over the country, and across all social classes and income groups, before it can win.

FLIGHT FROM KABUL

The collapse of the government in Kabul and the reported flight of President Najibullah brings to an end yet another bloody chapter in Afghan history. It began with the violent overthrow of President Daoud in 1978 and his replacement by hardline communists.

Najibullah had hung on to power far longer than the Mujahidin or the West expected after the Soviet withdrawal. He tried various means — adding a Muslim suffix to his name, dropping government ministers, offering talks with guerrilla leaders — to distance himself from his communist past and bolster his shaky political base by representing the regime as a non-ideological force for stability.

The United Nations agreement that led to the Soviet pull-out did not end the Afghan war. Both Moscow and Washington continued to supply weapons, including sophisticated missiles, to their former allies. The fighting was almost as bloody as during the decade of Soviet intervention, with rockets fired randomly into civilian areas and continued government bombing raids. Gradually the insurgents closed in.

Last year's agreement by the Russians and Americans to cut off arms — a measure of Moscow's bankruptcy and Washington's disillusion with fundamentalist and anti-Western guerrillas — hastened the end. The Mujahidin had plenty of weapons and supplies brought in from Pakistan and Iran; President Najibullah was soon left without food, munitions or money. In a land where loyalty is largely determined by gold and guns, he had little hope of survival.

The UN agreement removed Afghanistan as an East-West obstacle. Tribal politics were no longer overlaid with ideological significance, and control of this rugged terrain, for centuries an ungovernable buffer zone that separated rival empires, no longer affected the balance of power in Asia. Pakistan, which had been courted with generous aid by America for its strategic access to the Afghan rebels, was rapidly dropped by Washington. Finding itself yoked to the fundamentalist cause at the expense of links with the newly independent Central Asian states, it cut the flow of arms and distanced itself from the likes of Gulbuddin Hekmatyar. The war in Afghanistan faded from the world's attention.

The rapid collapse of Najibullah's forces has upset the UN plan to wind down the war gradually while preparing for an interim administration. The danger is that tribal rivalries will flare up as old scores are settled, and long suppressed rivalries fracture the Mujahidin's paper commitment to democracy. A bloodbath in Kabul would mock the increasingly fraught efforts by Benon Sevan, the special UN envoy, to install a transitional ruling council. It would also signal the end of Kabul as an effective administrative capital for the foreseeable future.

Afghanistan, if it can avoid the tribal anarchy of Somalia, is likely to revert to the kind of traditional society where there is no national authority but a series of locally negotiated pacts, no administrative structure but a patchwork of warlords and rival fiefdoms, all existing as they have for centuries against a background of continuing low-intensity warfare.

Outsiders will still try to meddle, and the variants of fundamentalist Islam will seek to promote their ideologies with the weapons still hidden in every village. But the conflicting ambitions of Iranians, Pakistanis, Tajiks, Uzbeks and other immediate neighbours will scarcely concern the wider world. Russia and the West, like the British Empire a century ago, have learnt the costs of playing the Great Game.

BOOT BUYERS BEWARE

On Sunday morning a million or so parents, full of fervour, will dress their children up for what has now become a traditional family activity: not going to church, but attending a car boot sale. Like a day at the races, this weekend pursuit combines the tantalising possibility of making money by selling junk or picking up a bargain, with fresh air, milling crowds and steaming hotdog vans.

As usual, when a spontaneous craze develops outside the scope of the authorities, killjoys move in to try to regulate its vitality. The Association of London Authorities is dying to have car boot sales licensed. Their growth has been debated in the House of Lords no less, with Lord Hailsham, in best fuddy-duddy tradition, admitting that he was not quite sure what a car boot sale was. Now the Consumers' Association is warning that buyers may face "a long slog" trying to enforce their legal rights under the Sale of Goods Act when they find their newly acquired second-hand television does not work.

Legal rights? At a car boot sale? Anyone who buys an electrical appliance from what is no more than a jumble sale on wheels is taking a gamble as risky as placing a bet on the Grand National. But the temptor is well aware of the caveat: if the £10 TV can pick up a channel, it is a fantastic bargain; if not, it was a worthwhile punt, and the buyer can probably sell it on for the same amount the following week.

Car boot sales are a perfect example of demand meeting supply. Sellers are reluctant to go home with a full boot, and will drop their prices until all their wares have gone. Such sales are thriving in the recession. People feeling impoverished can raise a little cash by selling the contents of their attic while others can buy second-hand goods for a snip. Around 10,000 sales take place on an average Sunday, drawing at least a million people — probably more on a double bank holiday weekend like the one ahead. The ideal weather conditions are cloudy but dry. Rain puts off the punters, while too much sun sends them off on a long walk or picnic.

Car boot sales are a relatively new phenomenon, imported from America where the yard or garage sale is an institution. Australians call them "trash-and-treasure" sales, and the quest for treasure is what draws in the thrash. A few years ago, a late 18th-century hunting painting bought for £4 in the West Country sold later for £5,500. Last year, four unpublished volumes of Sir Henry "Chips" Cannon's diaries were unearthed at a car boot sale and restored to his son, Paul.

The sales are also effective fundraisers for charity. Sellers have to pay a few pounds for the privilege of taking part, which can go towards church repairs or the maintenance of a village football pitch. And environmentalists can applaud an effective method of recycling.

Inevitably there are hazards. Some consignments of goods that have fallen off the back of a lorry may end up being sold from the back of a van. Burglars have been known to use car boot sales to offload the contents of other people's households. Professional dealers tend to arrive at dawn to snap up underpriced goods. But in Britain's black markets, as in those all over the world, the informality of the proceedings is what makes them all the more fun. Forget the Sale of Goods Act. They are to be enjoyed, but at your own peril.

Police relent on logbooks 'to maintain public confidence'

From the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis

Sir, Bernard Levin makes a serious point about the effect on public confidence of this service's recent introduction of new-style surveillance logs (article, April 13).

He will, therefore, I hope, be pleased to learn that the main bone of contention, the plastic insert sheet, is to be abandoned immediately. Please, Mr Levin, no more accusations about our fear of electrostatic examination of such logs.

What Mr Levin failed to give us credit for was the rest of the system. All our surveillance log books now carry a unique number. Similarly, each page is uniquely numbered. On completion, it is signed by the officer making the notes and countersigned by his supervisor. Any alterations or changes to the page must be noted and initialled at that time.

The much maligned plastic sheet also had a use which I am sure Mr Levin would have found acceptable. It was there to prevent anyone in one case from reading the surveillance notes from another which was completely unconnected. We will overcome this problem by using a new log book for every new case and the pages will remain in the book.

I do recognise the overwhelming importance of maintaining the high level of confidence we rightly enjoy from the public, and so, as I have said, the plastic sheet will go. Mr Levin may be assured that we pride ourselves on our ability to listen to criticism, consider it and, when justified, react to it.

I hope Mr Levin will give us credit for this. We do care what people say and think about us, which is why we also take note of opinion surveys. For instance, Mr Levin asserts that there has been a deterioration in police/public relations and that a gulf exists.

I must point him to the many surveys, such as one published by Gallup last September, which shows the police still have a 77 per cent satisfaction rating, although this had dropped from a previous high of 86 per cent ten years ago. The press trail far behind on 15 per cent. Is it possible that articles such as Mr Levin's are having an effect on both figures?

However, despite such surveys we are not complacent — which is why we react to criticism by change when that is the thing to do.

Yours faithfully,
PETER IMBERT,
New Scotland Yard, SW1.

African drought

From Lord Hamilton of Dalzell

Sir, I write in support of the letter from the High Commissioner for Zimbabwe (April 14). I have recently returned from a visit to Zimbabwe and Zambia and can confirm the seriousness of the situation there.

The country has suffered the worst drought for a century or more and the maize crop has virtually failed. While the plants have grown, they have died before producing any cobs.

In the past, Zimbabwe and South Africa have been exporters to Zambia, Mozambique and other countries in southern Africa. The effects of the drought, disastrous as they are for Zimbabwe, will be felt over a much wider field since all countries in the region have suffered as your report indicated in the same issue.

The High Commissioner points out the co-operation they need and are receiving from South Africa in offering the use of its ports for delivery of the very large quantities of maize and wheat which will be required before the next harvest. This will be at this time next year. This, however, helps resolve only part of the problem.

There are already shortages of food in some remoter parts of the country which have led to disturbances. There are major logistical problems in getting through by road and rail the amounts of food required and lorries sent from South Africa to Zambia are alleged to be arriving half empty.

A catastrophe of these dimensions could lead either to an improvement in relationships between the southern African states or to recrimination. It cannot be in the interests of Western governments to allow the latter at this vital stage in the development of democracy in South Africa. There is a pressing need to offer them both financial assistance and logistic support to help them work together to resolve the crisis.

Yours faithfully,
HAMILTON OF DALZELL,
Betchworth House,
Betchworth, Surrey.

From the Acting High Commissioner for Zambia

Sir, In my own country, Zambia, the rains have totally failed and we are experiencing the worst drought for 50 years. Boreholes and wells are dry, our cattle which people use as a source of livelihood are dying by the thousands. People are going without food because of a total crop failure.

I think it is time we put our priorities into perspective. People are starving and Zambia's hold initiative in democracy is in jeopardy. What we need is help.

Yours faithfully,
M. G. B. CHIGAGA,
Zambia House, 2 Palace Gate, W8.

Question of graffiti

From Mr Paul Redgrave

Sir, Philip Howard will persist in putting an interrogation mark after "rule or rules, OK", as in his report (April 8) on the Classical Association where, referring to women's breasts in art, he writes, "Women rule, OK".

In early modern graffiti (1600s?), where the jobs territorially sprayed, "Boat Boys rule, OK", or whoever they said ruled, he will see that there was no question mark, nor should there be. There was no question, "Boat Boys rule, OK" was a plain statement — though not necessarily of fact. It was the middle classes who added the ? thus distorting the lad's message. Yobs still rule, OK.

Yours faithfully,
PAUL REDGRAVE,
Orphalos, Greenville Park,
Yelverton, Devon.

Saturday night fever

From Mr Laurence Urdang

Sir, In today's story about American Airlines (Business, April 10) mentions the (almost universal) requirement that a traveller must remain away from home on a Saturday night evoked mixed emotions.

In my attempts at struggling against that demand, I have suggested to airlines that they are responsible for making me intensely suspicious, nearly visiting on me an acute case of paranoia: their being so uniformly keen to make certain that I am away from my home on a given Saturday always made me wonder what they were planning that I might be missing.

Cordially,
LAURENCE URDANG,
4 St Mary's Row,
Aylesbury, Buckinghamshire,

Christ on film

From Mrs Vera Crofts

Sir, Richard Johnson's article (Weekend Times, April 11) mentions that the British Board of Film Censors, formed in 1913, prohibited the depiction of Christ.

My uncle, R. Henderson Bland, an actor, beat them to it because he played Jesus Christ in a commercial film From Manger to Cross in 1912.

It was made in the Holy Land and I was taken to see it in the Albert Hall. I also saw it in Ellesmere parish, church, Shropshire, in the 1920s. I understand that part of it will be included in the Channel 4 documentary Jesus Christ Moviestar on Easter Monday.

Yours faithfully,
VERA CROFTS (née Bland),

From Mr Phil Tomlinson

Sir, Foster carers in Kirkcaldy now receive at least £33.80 a week for a child under five and those fostering for short periods at least £42.25, not an average of £23 as stated by the author of the York Centre for Health Economics report (details, April 2). Carers of more difficult children aged 13 and over receive up to £182.65 a week.

There are also allowances for birthdays, Christmas, holidays, etc. Yours faithfully,
PHIL TOMLINSON (Leader),
Fostering and Adoption Unit,
Kirkcaldy Metropolitan Council,

Addressing the issues

From Mrs Christina Speight

Sir, During the election we were regaled with endless comments on campaign tactics and rarely heard about politics. Then the commentators had the nerve to suggest the parties were not addressing the issues. My abiding memory is of Paddy Ashdown saying "I'm not going to indulge in a slanging match; I'm going to talk about policy". At which point he was immediately cut off. We heard a lot about John Major's soap box but were rarely given the opportunity to hear what it was he said when he was on it.

Although I realise the BBC and ITN were fed with photo-opportunities of Neil Kinnock playing with a toy on a see-saw and John Major with an owl, they didn't have to broadcast such rubbish. They're supposed to be independent and to judge items on their news value.

Yours sincerely,
CHRISTINA SPEIGHT,
20 Ramillies Road, W4.

Cheltenham's vote

From Councillor Robert Wilson

Sir, Where is the evidence to corroborate the allegations that the defeat of John Taylor, the black Conservative candidate in Cheltenham, was brought about by racism?

Although Mr Taylor was only selected 16 months ago, his result was only 2,688 votes short of the record poll achieved in 1987 by the then sitting member, Sir Charles Irving, in a three-cornered fight. If only prudent allowance is made for the loss of Sir Charles's personal cross-party vote, the participation of three other candidates and the tactical switch of a significant number of Labour supporters, it will be seen that Mr Taylor's defeat was indeed a close-run thing.

It should also be noted that the swing from the Conservatives here of 5.21 per cent was less than in either nearby Gloucester (5.34) or Stroud (6.21) where incumbent MPs were standing, and only a little worse than Bath, where 4.95 per cent defeated a Cabinet minister.

Community care

From the Director General of the Leonard Cheshire Foundation

Sir, Now that the composition of the new government is settled, can it turn its mind to, inter alia, community care matters? So much is still hoped for from the white paper, "Caring for People", which accompanied the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990.

Yet one recommendation which clearly stood out in the Griffiths report, "Agenda for Action", and not followed up was that a separate minister for community care was needed to unify the overlapping needs of care and health provision for disabled people and others in the community.

Can the Department of Health tell us which of its new ministers will assume this responsibility? Now that full implementation of the act is less than a year away this is most important, if ambiguity and gaps in provision are to be avoided and financial issues genuinely tackled.

Yours truly,
JAMES STANFORD,
Director General,
The Leonard Cheshire Foundation,
26-29 Mansel Street, SW1.

'Oscar' for engineers

From Mrs Pamela Hillyard

Sir, Encouraging our engineering talent (Mr W. Hill's letter, April 13) is fully recognised and understood by the Standing Conference on Schools Science and Technology (SCSST) which has developed Young Engineers Clubs countrywide since 1983.

The SCSST is funded by both government and industry. Its mission is to excite young people about science and technology, industry and engineering. It aims to stimulate curriculum change. It also works to motivate young people and encourage education-industry partnerships. It is planned that 1,200 clubs will be established with 24,000 young engineers by 1995.

My experience shows that a strong relationship is developing between schools and local companies throughout the country and there is a recognition that the word "engineering" has the same ring as the words "ingenuity" and "creativity", with both education and industry working together towards the success of each other — to the great benefit of young engineers and to the future of engineering in this country.

Yours faithfully,
PAMELA HILLYARD,
Young Engineers Clubs,

Christian concern at tax avoidance

From the Rector of Christ Church, Duns

Sir, I have been shocked by some of the ingenious forms of precautionary tax avoidance practised by City firms, for example the case you mentioned (report, April 4) of higher earners being given their entire year's salary to escape the consequences of a Labour government budget.

The underlying assumption seems to be that high earners have a right to avoid paying tax wherever possible, provided their behaviour is not illegal. And there seems to be a second assumption that loyalty is based exclusively on a cash nexus, sealed by cash in advance. Are we to assume that this means no tax-free cash up front, no loyalty?

On Sunday evenings our congregation has been examining the Ten Commandments and exploring their implications for Christian life today. We do not have many merchant bankers or advertising personnel in our congregation. But the dominant culture, of which tax-avoidance schemes are perhaps symptomatic, make a sombre backdrop for our reflections.

The Ten Commandments and Jesus's teaching in the Sermon on the Mount underline the fact that our love of God and our care for our neighbour, that is for other members of society, are inextricably linked. Where the Old Testament expresses the standards that God sets for his people in terms of a clear-cut moral and legal code the New Testament insists that we look behind the actions at the underlying motives.

Thus, where the Sixth Commandment is a clear injunction against murder, Jesus insists (Matthew 5: 21-24) that malicious anger and similar negative emotions are equally culpable.

From the perspective of our Sunday evening reflections I find the reported forms of tax avoidance wholly unacceptable. They are a denial of love and concern for our neighbour. As a contribution to the well-being of our country the activities of the financial consultants seem to me highly questionable.

During the past decade or so our dominant culture seems to have legitimised private greed by re-labelling it "wealth creation". The election campaign showed a conspicuous lack of moral or ethical debate. I should be delighted if representatives of all political parties were willing to condemn such forms of tax avoidance and those financial consultants advocating them.

Yours sincerely,
CHRIS MARTIN,
The Rectory, Wellfield, Duns, Berwickshire,
April 14.

However, extensive canvassing showed the race issue to be, at best, marginal, more than counter-balanced by a strong pro-Taylor vote from many non-Tory constituents.

Bearing in mind that we suffer a Lib Dem county council, a Labour borough council (24 to 8 Tories) and that they have targeted this seat assiduously since 1983, the Lib Dems should be asking why their majority was so meagre. Well done, John Taylor.

Yours faithfully,
ROBERT WILSON,
The Old Sudeley Arms,
21 Hailes Street, Winchcombe,
Cheltenham, Gloucestershire.

From Mrs Carol Behard
Sir, I voted Liberal Democrat in Cheltenham. This was a tactical vote. I had to vote this way because I am so prejudiced against John Taylor: he is a Conservative.

Yours faithfully,
CAROL BEHARD,
29 Burton Street,
Cheltenham, Gloucestershire.

From Mr John Whitmore

Sir, In calling for a tolerant use of patronage your leader ("Not one of us", April 14) is praiseworthy. But appointments in the gift of government would hardly even appear to be patronage at all if selection took place after open advertisement and objective job-related criteria for choosing were established.

We saw what I hope to be the beginnings of a healthy development when the post of Director of Public Prosecutions was advertised. An open society in which equal opportunity flourishes requires such a practice.

Yours faithfully,
JOHN WHITMORE,
21 Portland Road, Leicester.

From Mr Douglas Verrall

Sir, I am glad that the headteachers of our schools are not changed as frequently as is the Secretary of State for Education.

Yours sincerely,
DOUGLAS VERRALL,
3 Springfield Road,
St Leonards-on-Sea, East Sussex.

From Mr Basil Hoole

Sir, Is it too unkind to suggest that we ought to revert to the good old days when MPs bought their votes with their own money?

Yours faithfully,
BASIL HOOLE,
Copper Coin, Priestlands,
Sherborne, Dorset.

Short sees victory slip from grasp

BY RAYMOND KEENE, CHESS CORRESPONDENT

NIGEL Short, Britain's hope in the world chess championship semi-final, came frustratingly close to victory in the adjourned third game of his world qualifying title match in Linares, Spain, against the former world champion Anatoly Karpov.

Short had adjourned the game with what looked like an overwhelming advantage and in a marathon second session of play, which finished on Wednesday night, he extended his plus to a two-pawn lead.

Karpov's situation seemed hopeless but at this moment Short lost the thread of the game and instead of driving home his advantage he allowed the ex-leader Karpov to slither out with half a point.

In the final position Short is a pawn ahead but the particular configuration of the pieces remaining on the board makes it impossible to advance his pawn to become a queen.

Recognising the futility of further attempts Short extended his hand and offered a draw. The score is now 2-1 in Karpov's favour.

In the second game of the concurrent semi-final in Linares between Artur Yusupov and the top Dutch grandmaster Jan Timman, a draw was agreed in 46 moves, after Timman had missed a probable win. The score in that match, is now 1-1 in favour of Yusupov.

Both matches have a prize fund of 300,000 Swiss francs and are for the best of ten games.
The moves for the third Short-Karpov game were as follows:

The Queen was overwhelmed by gifts of daffodils during a walkabout yesterday after she distributed Maundy money at Chester Cathedral. Among the 132 recipients was Terry Waite's mother. Afterwards the Queen told Lena Waite, 78: "I think your son is wonderful."

The 66 men and 66 women — 10 mark the Queen's 66th birthday this year — received the money in recognition of the Christian service they have rendered to the church and the community. The ceremony has its roots in the last supper of Christ. A spokesman for the Chester Diocese, the Rev Tim Barker, said: "I would imagine Mrs Waite has been selected particularly because of the great courage and enduring Christian strength she showed during her son's imprisonment."

The Queen arrived at the cathedral, celebrating its 900th anniversary this year, to the cheers of crowds waiting outside in the spring sunshine. She walked up the cathedral aisle with the Duke of Edinburgh, followed by Yeomen of the Guard bearing purses containing the money on trays above their heads.

After the service, Mrs Waite, of Lymington, Cheshire, said it was an honour to have been chosen. "The Queen asked me how Terry was and I said he was fine."

Astronomy

Light cast on 'dark matter'

BY NIGEL HAWKES, SCIENCE EDITOR

DURHAM University astronomers have used the Hubble space telescope to provide independent confirmation of the existence of "dark matter" in space.

The result was announced at a meeting of the Royal Astronomical Society at Durham this week and marks a triumph both for the much derided space telescope and for the theory that the universe is largely made up of material which we cannot see or sense.

Professor Richard Ellis and colleagues from Durham and the University of New South Wales took a gamble by devoting all 12 hours of their observing time on the Hubble telescope by pointing it at a single object, a remote galactic cluster called A114. By looking for so long in the same direction, they hoped to overcome the optical deficiencies of the telescope by sheer weight of data. The play worked, and they produced an image between five and ten times crisper than anything possible from the Earth.

The result is that they can use the image to assess the degree to which light from even more distant objects passing through the galactic cluster is bent by gravity, an effect first predicted by Einstein. "In effect, we are observing the effect of a galactic

"lens" whose focusing power depends on its mass," Professor Ellis said. "By observing the distortion of light passing through the lens, we can work out the mass of the galaxy."

The result turns out to be consistent with earlier calculations, based on the movements of galaxies, that suggest that at least nine-tenths of the material in the universe is invisible. This so-called "dark matter", which could be neutrinos, black holes, or exotic and hitherto unknown particles, is important as well as mysterious, because the amounts of it will determine whether the universe goes on expanding for ever or eventually collapses.

York rail museum steams into future

BY PAUL WILKINSON

THE fruits of a £6 million improvement and repair programme were seen yesterday when the National Railway Museum at York was re-opened by the Duke of Kent after a two-year refit.

After doubling its size to fill a 17 acre site next to York's mainline station, the museum is now the largest of its kind in the world.

Its director, Andrew Dow, is convinced that the exhibition should not just be a collection of old steam locomotives, but a display of the history of railways up to the present day.

As a consequence visitors will enter the former engine shed through a 24 ft high complete ring section of the Channel Tunnel towering over surrounding exhibits.
Close by will be one of British Rail's latest passenger coaches. Mr Dow said: "Only 7 per cent of our visitors are railway enthusiasts. We want to attract families looking for a good day out and who will not get bored by a daunting display of old technology."

The museum, which opened in York in 1975 had closed two years ago after faults were discovered in its concrete roof supports.

A temporary exhibition on an adjoining site, "The Great Railway Show", was so successful that it won the 1991 Museum of the Year award and as a result will now become a permanent, show alongside the repaired and expanded museum building.

Richard Gibbon, the curator of engineering, said: "The museum is not about steam locomotives, it's about rail catching on the line, porters uniforms, rail unions, anything at all to do with railways. Our duty is to illustrate the whole scene."

Iraqi sites 'devastated' in quest for farmland

BY NORMAN HAMMOND

ARCHAEOLOGICAL sites in Iraq are more endangered now than they were at the height of the Gulf war, a leading American scholar has reported. Economic hardships have led to large tracts of marginal land being brought up for subsistence agriculture, including ancient cities untouched for millennia.

Professor Paul Zimansky, of Boston University, said: "We're in for very dark times. It is the worst kind of devastation for archaeology."

The professor recently visited Iraq to assess conditions at Mashkan-shapir, an Old Babylonian capital 75 miles from Baghdad which he and Dr Elizabeth Stone rediscovered three years ago.
He found that the site, which had been far from any cultivation when they were last able to dig there in 1990, was now cut off by a network of irrigation ditches, canals and ploughed fields. "We could not get to the site," Professor Zimansky said. "We still don't know if it's all right or not."

There has also been widespread looting of sites in the countryside, he said. The Antiquities Department has no telephones or vehicles, and has been unable to assess the damage. Some of the regional museums may have been robbed and their collections damaged.

No foreign expeditions are yet working again in Iraq but Iraqi archaeologists hope to begin investigations again this spring. Professor Zimansky said. He and Dr Stone had found "a complete absence of anti-Americanism" in their travels.

OBITUARIES

SIR CLIFFORD DARBY

Professor Sir Clifford Darby, CBE, professor of geography at the University of Cambridge, 1966-77, died on April 14 aged 83. He was born at Resolven, Glamorgan, on February 7, 1909.

CLIFFORD Darby (H. C. Darby, as he was known through his writings) exercised a profound influence on the development and understanding of historical geography both in this country and the United States. He is most widely known for the magisterial work The Domesday Geography of England which appeared in seven volumes between 1952 and 1977. This magnum opus was largely conceived by Darby; he was its general editor and contributed very substantially to the work, whose first six volumes covered the country, region by region, and were summarised in a seventh. In this great enterprise he thus became one of that rare group of academics who have single handedly established an active school of researchers, whose members were able to absorb and expand his original ideas.

This undertaking called for scholarship of the highest order and demonstrated Darby's capacity to marshal decisive evidence with candour and patience. But like all his achievements it rested on a strongly practical bent as a geographer, an ability to elaborate medieval geography using land surveys, and the capacity to reconstruct a vanished landscape from contemporary documents. These same qualities, incidentally, had enabled him to play an important role in wartime naval intelligence.

Henry Clifford Darby was educated at Neath County School and entered St Catharine's College, Cambridge, when he was only 16. This unusually early entry was more than justified by his subsequent career: he took first class honours in both parts of the geographical tripos. After graduation Darby began research on the Fenland under Bernard Manning who had a great effect on him. In 1929 he visited southern Africa at the time of the Cape Town, but more particularly the suggestion of Isaiah Bowman, then director of the American Geographical Society, that he should undertake some work which led to the publication of Pioneer Problems in Rhodesia and Nyasaland in 1932.

He had taken his PhD in 1931 and in that same year succeeded Manning as lecturer in historical geography at Cambridge. In the following year he was elected to the Ehrman fellowship at King's College, where he met Sir John Clapham, who had considerable influence on his academic outlook. Until the outbreak of war Darby was busy at research and teaching and edited and contributed to An Historical Geography of England before 1800 which appeared in 1936. The Medieval Fenland and The Draining of the Fens, which both appeared in 1940, were distinguished by careful scholarship and showed how fully Darby appreciated the geographical and historical aspects of a process which had steadily altered the character of this erstwhile "protruding amphibious district" since the end of the middle ages.

In 1940 Darby was commissioned in the Intelligence Corps. There he directed a team whose aim was to produce a series of documents which would explain to practical naval men, whether captains of ships, midshipmen, in charge of boats, or leaders of parties of marines, the nature of any coast they might be called upon to invade. This undertaking involved not merely describing physical features — capes, bays, beaches and creeks — but also explaining in a lucid manner what languages, industries and other economic characteristics the assaulting forces might have to cope with, onshore. From 1941 to 1945 Darby was intimately associated with the publication of the Cambridge volumes of the Admiralty handbooks which were prepared at the Scott Polar Research Institute. For his war work he was made OBE in 1946.

In 1945 Darby was appointed to the John Rankin chair of geography at Liverpool. There he revived and rehabilitated the department which had been evacuated during the war, and whose staff had been scattered. He gathered around him some very able young men, several of whom were later elected to professorships in other universities. He developed research activities and established a strong technical side — a development he extended considerably when he went to London in 1949.

At University College he succeeded C. B. Fawcett in the oldest chair of geography in this country. He strongly encouraged research and publication by his colleagues and pupils and he built up a large and distinguished department. He was active in establishing joint appointments with the School of Slavonic Studies and the Latin American Institute. During this time he made several visits to America and was visiting professor at Chicago, 1952; Harvard, 1959 and 1964-65; and Washington, 1963.

He moved to the chair at Cambridge and resumed his association with King's College, where he was elected to a professorial fellowship and on his retirement in 1976 became an emeritus fellow. Unfortunately he arrived at Cambridge at a time of financial stringency and was only partially able to expand the developments in the scope and content of the trips which had already begun. What was even more frustrating was the severe limitation in the appointment of new staff.

It was also a time when, in all universities, staff-student relations were beginning to pose problems, with the hitherto acknowledged right of age and experience to lecture to callow youth being everywhere called into question. Geography in Cambridge and elsewhere was scarcely affected in this way, but Darby soon showed by his attitude and approachability that he was well able to talk effectively to the occasional undergraduate in his department who was imbued with those fashionable doctrines which considered acquiring some acquaintance with the wisdom of ages to be an activity inferior to "spontaneous responses" to one's immediate surroundings. Part of Darby's authority with the young in an informal manner lay in the fact that he was such an excellent communicator as a teacher and lecturer.

None of his university preoccupations checked — as they so often, regrettably, do, when creative scholars become embroiled in the minutiae of academic wrangling — a steady flow of publications, both as contributor and editor. His A New Historical Geography of England of 1973 appeared in a two-volume edition three years later and The Changing Fenland was published in 1983. Meanwhile older works of his continued to be popular. The University Atlas (edited with H. Fullard) of 1937 went through its 22nd edition in 1983, while The Library Atlas (also with H. Fullard), which had appeared in the same year, was in its 15th edition by 1981. These two editors collaborated again on The New Cambridge Modern History Atlas which was published in 1975 and immediately acknowledged as being unexampled in its field.

Darby's scholarship and practical ability were recognised in many ways: he was a member of the English Place Name Society and also of the Royal Commission on Ancient Monuments. From 1958 to 1963 he was a member of the National Parks Commission, and from 1964 to 1968 of the Water Resources Board. He was president of the Institute of British Geographers in 1961 and chairman of the British National Committee for Geography, 1973-78. America and the Netherlands honoured him and in 1957 he was made an honorary member of the Croatian Geographical Society. At home, he was also made an honorary member of the Royal Geographical Society and, in addition to his numerous honorary degrees, and fellowship of the British Academy, was created CBE in 1978 and knighted in 1988 for his services to the study of historical geography.

He married in 1941 Eva Constantine Thompson, 58, and their two daughters survive him.

J. W. DEEGAN

Joseph William Deegan, a former inspector-general of the colonial police, died on April 14 aged 93. He was born on February 8, 1899.

he was brought back to London in 1956 as deputy inspector-general of the colonial police. He retired after five years, only to return in 1963 for two more years and eventually to serve as inspector-general himself in 1966-67.

He travelled the world in his Colonial Office job, throughout the West Indies, Africa and Asia. He investigated corruption in the Caribbean and advised his political masters in Whitehall on the internal security of countries which were being considered for independence from Britain.

A quiet thoughtful Irishman, Deegan was educated at schools in his native Dublin and began work as a tea boy on The Irish Times. But his life changed in 1919 when he joined the army and while serving as a quartermaster-sergeant was seconded to the King's African Rifles in what was then Tanganyika.

Despite long gruelling foot safaris through the bush, he so fell in love with the country and its climate that when his tour of duty had come to an end he left the army rather than return to Britain and instead joined the Tanganyika police. He served in the force for 13 years from 1925 until 1938 when he moved to Entebbe in Uganda. He was awarded the Colonial Police Medal in 1942 and the King's Police Medal in 1950.

One reason why he was reluctant to return to this country in 1925 was perhaps that he had met his future wife, Nell, while in East Africa, where her father was working with the Imperial War Graves Commission. They married in 1926 and seven years ago celebrated their diamond wedding. He is survived by her and by their son and two daughters.

By this time, however, Deegan himself had long moved on. After 18 years in the Ugandan police, the last six of them as commissioner, interest in that part of Central Asia.

Longmire joined the Foreign Service in 1950 first going to the embassy in Moscow. He was to return there twice more, in 1958 and finally from 1968 to 1971 as First Secretary.

He finished his diplomatic career in the research department of the Foreign Office.

Robert Longmire

ROBERT A. Longmire, the editor of the journal of the Royal Society of Asian Affairs for nearly ten years, has died. He brought to the journal a knowledge, built up over a lifetime, of the affairs of the Soviet Union and a keen interest in that part of Central Asia.

Longmire joined the Foreign Service in 1950 first going to the embassy in Moscow. He was to return there twice more, in 1958 and finally from 1968 to 1971 as First Secretary.

He finished his diplomatic career in the research department of the Foreign Office.

April 17 ON THIS DAY 1794

In the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, the Post Office had the sole right to receive foreign newspapers and sell them to subscribers. The Times established its own foreign news service, often using a cutter running across the Channel to bring its own correspondents as well as items from continental papers.

FRANCE

Paris, April 9

The conduct of Chabot, and of Espérance, the jobber, is held out as having belonged to a system of corruption. The agents consisted of Renoit, Angers, Baron de Baz, the Ex-Constable, Chabot's two brothers-in-law, and Guzman, the Spaniard. Renoit, the employ of le Brun and Brisot in England, as represented as having there studied the art of corruption and duplicity.

With this system of corruption was connected the conspiracy of Fabre d'Églantine, who had, from his youth upwards, been addicted to theft and yet had, not withstanding, been named to the Presidency of National Convention of Danton, who, a parrot at the commencement, had afterwards been openly withdrawn himself from the Committee of Public Safety, the better to concentrate the plan of his operations, and of Camille Desmoulins, who endeavoured to impede by his modernism the vigorous measures which the revolutionary movement required.

As to Westermann, he was the agent and accomplice of Desmoulins continually addressed himself to the people. The courage the latter affected to display was a very painful effort. The head of Danton alone was displayed to the spectators, who as usual made the air resound with the cry of vive la République!

No spectacle can possibly be more horrid than that of the present state of this capital. The streets every where blocked up by beggars, whose importunities obstruct the passenger at every step he takes. A prodigious number of houses unoccupied, and of shops shut up. Crowds besieging the doors of the bakers' and butchers' shops. Pits filled up with victims who have sought a termination of their miserable existence in the Place de la Revolution and the police continually on foot for the purpose of new arrests which keep every one in dread that the visit may be to him.

PROFESSOR ALAN WILLIAMS

Professor Alan Williams, FRS, biochemist, died from lung cancer at the Churchill Hospital, Oxford, on April 9 aged 46. He was born in Australia on May 25, 1945.

ALAN Williams made three major contributions to his field of interest, the biochemical analysis of the molecules at the leucocyte cell surface. His recognition that the immunoglobulin domain was a biochemical structure whose expression was not confined to molecules involved in immunity led him to suggest the existence of the immunoglobulin superfamily. This prediction has been amply proven with more than 50 proteins on leucocytes being in this family and many others in different tissues.

Second was the characterisation of the first mammalian cell surface protein to be integrated into the membrane by a glycopospholipid anchor rather than through a hydrophobic protein sequence. This result paralleled similar findings in parasites by others.

Finally, when Cesar Milstein and George Kohler published the first paper on monoclonal antibodies, which later earned them the Nobel prize, Williams immediately recognised the potential of monoclonal antibodies as immunological tools, both for the identification of novel molecules and for their purification. He published a paper with Cesar Milstein and co-workers which described the characterisation of three new molecules. One of these is the rat homologue of what became called CD4 in man and which others were to show was the receptor for the AIDS virus.

In recognition of these contributions national and international honours followed. He was made a member of the European Molecular Biology Organisation (1984), an honorary member of the American Society of Immunologists (1989), an honorary member of the Scandinavian Society of Immunology (1990) and a fellow of the Royal Society (1990). In addition he received an ad honorem professorship of immunology from Oxford University (1990). Late in 1991 he accepted an invitation to succeed Professor Henry Harris, FRS, as head of the Sir William Dunn School of Pathology, Oxford, and was due to take up his position in October.

Alan Williams obtained his Bachelor of Agricultural Science degree from the University of Melbourne in 1967 and then moved to Adelaide where he worked for his PhD. On the completion of his thesis he and his wife Ros came to Oxford where he became a member of the biochemistry department headed by the late Professor Rodney Porter, FRS. In 1977 Williams was appointed director of the Medical Research Council Cellular Immunology Research Unit in succession to Professor (later Sir) James Gowans and he held this post until his death.

To his colleagues and students Williams was a real enthusiast for biochemical research and he brought many projects to fruition by his drive and energy. It was characteristic of him and an example of remarkable courage that he was actively engaged in the preparation of a major reference book on the biochemistry of molecules at the cell surface until the day before he died. He made no secret of his lung cancer and by facing it openly he made it easier for others to deal with the psychological aspects of his disease.

The standards of scientific excellence that he set produced a cohort of postgraduates who were well founded in the pursuit of scientific knowledge. He showed much concern in their subsequent careers although few people knew what care went into the references that he wrote. His own career in science brought him many friends for he was most generous in sharing the proceeds of his talent with others.

He is survived by his wife, Ros and his two children, Ben and Eliza.

George ("Toby") Paine, CB, DFC, former director of statistics at the Inland Revenue and Registrar General for England and Wales, died on March 2 aged 73. He was born on April 14, 1918.

GEORGE Paine's wide background in economic statistics, his general quick-wittedness and a certain combativeness in argument were of great value in providing a reliable underpinning of statistical advice as possible to successive chancellors of the exchequer and to the Board of Inland Revenue, where he was director of statistics from 1957 to 1972; he became a familiar figure in the official box in the House of Commons during budget debates.

In the course of his tenure as director of statistics increasingly complicated changes in taxation came under consideration with correspondingly increasing demands for statistical support. His later years at the Board of Inland Revenue saw the introduction of a capital gains tax and a complete restructuring of the company taxation system. He was made a CB in 1974.

The final stage of Paine's professional career saw him leaving the Inland Revenue in 1972 to become the first professional statistician to occupy the post of Registrar General for England and Wales and director of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys, which had been formed in 1970 by the merger of the General Register Office and the Government Social Survey. He held this post with distinction until his retirement, and was substantially responsible for unifying the two somewhat disparate components into a single department. He was also responsible for the production of the results from the 1971 census of population, and for much of the planning for the 1981 census, which proved to be one of the most successful since the war.

Toby Paine, as he was universally known, came from a farming family in Kent, a background which was to remain important to him throughout his life. He was educated at Bradford College and Peterhouse, Cambridge, where he read mathematics and took a double first. He joined the RAF in 1942, serving as a flight lieutenant with characteristic bravery, and was awarded the DFC in 1944.

His farming interests made it appropriate that when he entered the statistician class of the Home Civil Service in 1948 it should have been in the Ministry of Agriculture. But only a year later he was transferred to the company statistics post at the Board of Inland Revenue, so entering the field of economic and taxation statistics which was to occupy more than 20 years of his professional life. From 1954 to 1957 he was the company sector statistician at the Central Statistics Office and in 1957 moved to the Board of Trade on promotion to chief statistician.

After only a few months there he moved back to the Board of Inland Revenue to replace Reginald Beales as director of the statistics division, first as chief statistician level and then, from 1966, as under-secretary.

He was a demanding but fair manager who would always give total support to his staff, once their statistical costings had withstood the keen scrutiny which he gave them.

For most of Paine's professional life his main relaxation had been to return to his family's farm to assist with the hop harvest there, and on his retirement he was happy to indulge once again in this the most enduring of his many interests. He retired to a smallholding in an idyllic spot in Wiltshire and devoted his full formidable energies to the cultivation of more than a thousand apple, pear and plum trees and to looking after his beloved bee-hives.

He leaves a widow, Hilary, to whom he was married in 1969, and three children by his wife's first marriage, to whom he was a devoted step-father.

Workers use Easter break to clear City bomb damage

By LIN JENKINS

AN ARMY of builders, glaziers, scaffolders and road sweepers are working overtime during the holiday weekend in a race to clear up the devastation caused by last Friday's IRA bombing of the City of London.

Hundreds of skips are to be moved into the empty streets over Easter when broken glass in some of the 200 damaged buildings on the main traffic routes can at last be knocked out without risk to the public. Tons of paperwork that the wind has whipped from exposed desks, and which has choked the streets all week, can be cleared away.

Some of the roads around the most severely affected area, such as Bevis Marks, Leadenhall Street and Cannon Street, will be closed for a time to allow the clear-up to continue. A spokesman for the City of London said: "With the priority being put on getting the city back to work and causing the minimum disruption to the business community, the Easter break provides a brilliant opportunity to clear up. The key thing will be making safe the buildings in St Mary Axe, so that and part of Leadenhall Street can be reopened."

Replacing of some buildings, including the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank, begins today and is expected to take up to three months. District surveyors have already handed back most of the buildings to their owners, but have further work to carry out on the Chamber of Shipping and the Baltic Exchange which took the brunt of the blast. Parts of both buildings will be dismantled over the weekend.

Dragged anchor severs cross-Channel cable

By NICK NUTTALL, TECHNOLOGY CORRESPONDENT

MONARCH, a ship owned by British Telecom equipped to lay and repair telecommunications cables, was dispatched from Southampton yesterday after a key undersea cable carrying telephone and data communications to the Continent was severed late on Wednesday evening.

Some services to Europe and the rest of the world, including communications from City of London dealing rooms and reports from the Press Association news agency, were disrupted for more than eight hours. Engineers at Mercury Communications, one of the firms that uses the 80-mile Brighton to Dieppe cable, worked to re-route calls.

A spokesman for BT said it had taken the same amount of time to restore fully their services, although he emphasised that no customers had noticed any difference as urgent customers had been dealt with first. A Mercury spokesman said services were fully restored at about 5am by feeding communications via UK-Netherlands 12, a fibre optic cable running from Aldeburgh, Suffolk, to Domburg.

A microwave radio link, operated by BT between Tolson Hill, Kent, and the French coast, has also been commandeered "in accordance with a pre-planned restoration programme".

Initially, rough seas were blamed for the break, which happened on the two-year-old UK-France 3 cable which is owned by Mercury, BT and France Telecom. Later the cause had been pinpointed to an unnamed ship "dragging its anchor down the Channel" about 2.5 miles off Dieppe. This had damaged the cable, which is buried in the sea bed to a depth of around three feet.

Alistair Grieve, general manager of Mercury's international business group, emphasised that there had been no danger to marine life because, unlike transatlantic fibre optic cables, the cross-channel links operate at low voltages.

with a minibus on the A40 on the outskirts of Haverfordwest, Dyfed. Police said four of five of the casualties were seriously injured. In Pwllgorr, 16 pensioners were treated for minor injuries after their coach crashed on a hill.

Long queues built up on either side of the Severn Bridge. AA Roadwatch said there was an eight-mile tailback heading west and a five-mile queue eastbound. Further into Wales, another queue built up on the A55 as westbound holidaymakers ran into roadworks. There were more delays in Chester, where police driving conditions contributed to a 11-mile tailback in each direction on the M6.

own party. Now he would have to answer for his actions. He should be handed over to the appropriate authorities.

It was a stunning ousting by Mr. Wakil, whose apparent purpose was to demonstrate to the mujahidin "our brothers" he called them, that the Watan party was ready to embrace its former enemies. He said power had shifted temporarily to the four provinces, but he soon expected a temporary ruling council would assume all executive powers. It would be made up of non-controversial figures, some of them out of the country.

David Evans, the UN envoy on Afghanistan, spent yesterday in emergency meetings in Kabul trying to put some kind of ruling structure in place. It is clear that army generals are playing a key role in the transition.

About 20 miles out of the city soldiers with tanks wait by the main highway leading to the north, while mujahidin and their unlikely allies mutinous troops and militia wait just over the hills. Fundamentalist mujahidin, who still appear determined to capture Kabul, say the UN peace plan is unacceptable and that they will fight on.

Mr Wakil said 45 generals and 17 other senior officers supported the UN plan. Several possibilities are now emerging. One is that some mujahidin groups and sections of the army will form an alliance to protect the capital from the fundamentalists.

Lloyd's relieved as High Court rules drawdowns can go ahead

Names fail in bid to stop assets seizure

By Jonathan Prynn

A HUGE collective sigh of relief was breathed by the Lloyd's insurance market yesterday with the news that a legal move by 800 names to prevent Lloyd's seizing their assets to pay claims had been blocked in the High Court.

The names, advised by Michael Freeman, a leading Lloyd's lawyer, now stand to lose "tens of millions of pounds" as drawdowns on their deposits begin after Easter. Mr Freeman said yesterday that there was now "nothing we can do to prevent that". However, the names are likely to proceed with a full claim for damages when the drawdowns have been made later in the year.

The judgment against the names by Mr Justice Saville was widely expected but, nevertheless, has been greeted enthusiastically in and around Lime Street. Paul Archard, chairman of the Lloyd's Underwriting Agents Association, said: "If it had gone the other way, it would have been a very, very serious threat to Lloyd's but there was never really a prayer of its succeeding. The judgment is a very clear signal to people buying policies from Lloyd's that they are going to get paid. It is very good news for the policyholders."

David Coleridge, the chairman of Lloyd's, said: "We are naturally delighted with the judgment in Lloyd's and the members' agents' favour. We had every confidence in the outcome from the date proceedings were initiated. Underwriting members of Lloyd's have a legal obligation to keep their agents in funds at all times. The primacy of this principle, 'pay now, sue later', has been upheld and their funds can now be released to meet the cash calls made by their agents."

The judge did not award Lloyd's costs, but has awarded the members' agents costs on standard terms.

The Freeman action was probably the most threatening of all the myriad legal actions around the world that Lloyd's is facing. If the case had gone against Lloyd's, the market would have been unable to tap the personal financial resources of names on loss-making syndicates and would have broken the chain of security behind the Lloyd's policy.

However, the judgment leaves many names facing personal financial ruin. One estimate suggested up to 4,000 names would be effectively bankrupted by the drawdowns. Almost 1,000 have already applied to the Lloyd's hardship committee to negotiate a programme of payments of their Lloyd's debts over the rest of their lives.

About 30 of the names involved in the action were in court to hear the judgment. One said the reaction had been "grim", with several of the names facing the loss of their homes when the drawdown procedure begins. One farmer who has lost £800,000 said he would be forced to sell his farm. The text of the judgment will not be available for about two weeks.

The judgment against the Freeman names is likely to trigger at least two new actions by names. The Goodwin Walker Action Group, one of the most aggressive of the 11 active names groups, has prepared an injunction, which it had been holding back while the Freeman action still stood a chance of success.

A new umbrella action group for names facing personal bankruptcy is also to be launched early next week. The Distressed Names LMX Spiral Action Group is provisionally headed by Andrew Grossman, an American lawyer, who is one of the leading players in the legal moves against Lloyd's in New York. In a letter to be sent to thousands of names on the hardest hit syndicates, Mr Grossman said the group, which is advised by Withers, the law firm, would attempt to use a legal opinion from Gavin Lightman QC as the basis for an injunction. In the letter, Mr Grossman said it was known that "Mr Freeman's application based on technical objection stood little chance of success." The only realistic possibility of obtaining an injunction, according to Mr Grossman, "is to base a claim either on criminal fraud or dishonesty". Mr Grossman has asked for £300 to join the new group.

Another group of names, those on the 1982 Outwaite syndicate, who were left out of the £116 million settlement in February, also lobbied closer to the courts this week with a decision to issue a writ before the end of the week. About 300 names, including many who work in the market, have given the go-ahead for a writ although they are still pressing for a solution to their claim that does not involve legal action.

Mr Coleridge is said to be examining proposals that will offer all names who have suffered heavy losses in recent years some relief through a levy on the market. However, he would face resistance from many in the market who believe that names must be made to meet their full responsibilities under their underwriting agreements.

National Power wins case

By Martin Waller

THE Office of Electricity Regulation (Ofreg), the power industry watchdog, has ruled National Power is not guilty of abusing its strong position in the electricity generation market by discriminating against London Electricity, one of the regional distributors.

London had alleged it had been effectively shut out of the potentially lucrative electricity contract supply market. Professor Stephen Littlechild, the director general of electricity supply, did, however, request undertakings from National Power and PowerGen, the smaller generator, including one that they would run their supply offshoots as separately financed companies.

National Power has given the undertakings, aimed at preventing anti-competitive cross-subsidies between its supply and generation businesses. A similar deal is being discussed with PowerGen.

Professor Littlechild said electricity suppliers offering low prices must make comparable offers to all similar customers. "This should discourage a supplier from adopting a predatory pricing policy designed to freeze out competition, without preventing price cutting which reflects genuinely lower costs," he said.

National Power said it was happy with the ruling and did not practise discrimination or cross-subsidies. London Electricity said it was satisfied with Professor Littlechild's actions. Clive Myers, marketing and supply director, said: "The undertakings National Power has given will avoid discrimination in the future. We hope PowerGen will enter into a similar understanding." PowerGen said it could not comment while talks were continuing.

Budget deficit soars to record £6.4bn for month

By Colin Narbrough, Economics Correspondent

THE budget deficit leapt to a record £6.4 billion in March to take the public sector borrowing requirement (PSBR) for the whole of fiscal 1991-2 to £13.9 billion, slightly more than the Chancellor forecast last month.

Although the March data came as no surprise in the City, it underlined the rapid deterioration in government finances which has become a source of concern in financial markets. For the current fiscal year, Norman Lamont predicts the PSBR will more than double to £28 billion. In 1990-1, there was a net repayment of £500 million.

Excluding privatisation receipts, fiscal 1991-2 showed a PSBR of £21.8 billion, compared with a £4.9 billion budget deficit the previous year.

The previous PSBR record for a single month was £3.9 billion in March 1988.

The record PSBR this March was seen by economists as an alarming foreboding of things to come. Last month, central government borrowing was £4.71 billion, against £1.9 billion in February. Local authority borrowing rose to £2.8 billion from £2.08 billion. Privatisation proceeds were £100 million.

Bank of England figures showed banknotes in circulation jumping 5.8 per cent in the week to April 15. The previous week, the annual rise was 1.2 per cent. Simon Briscoe, economist at Midland Montagu, said the timing of Easter last year explained the surge. □ The dollar reached new heights of DM1.6720 in New York, before settling back at DM1.6665, in response to figures showing America's trade gap at its smallest for nearly nine years and lower claims for unemployment benefit. The trade balance was $3.4 billion in deficit in February, instead of a forecast $5.2 billion. Exports set a record, while imports fell slightly, but about a third of the improvement in the balance was attributable to notoriously erratic exports of aircraft and parts. The January deficit was $5.9 billion.

Weekly labour department data on first-time claims for unemployment benefit in the week ending April 4 fell 17,000 from the previous week.

UK factories boost competitiveness

By Ross Tieman, Industrial Correspondent

BRITAIN'S manufacturers have sharply increased competitiveness, according to figures from the employment department.

The year-on-year growth in output per head during February, at 4.3 per cent, was the highest since the second quarter of 1989. The upsurge helped make the upward trend over the latest quarter, at 2.9 per cent a month, the highest for over two years.

Productivity improvements were underpinned by a further fall in wages and salaries per unit of output. In the three months to mid-February, the annualised rise was 4.5 per cent, the lowest level since the second quarter of 1989.

The improvements were reflected by similar, but more modest, gains in the competitive position of the economy as a whole.

The rise in unit costs for the whole economy during the final quarter of 1991 was 5.7 per cent. There was a 1.8 per cent rise in productivity during the period.

Employment department figures also showed a fall in the number out of work during March, by 3,010, to 2,707,477. After seasonal adjustment, the rise in unemployment, of 7,400, was the smallest for 23 months.

The disappointment in the latest figures was the absence of a reduction in the rate of increase in average earnings. The year-on-year rise was unchanged at 7.4 per cent.

BP's chief treads the boards with skill

By Jon Ashworth

Horton: star turn

THE Barbican Concert Hall has played host to many famous performers in its time. Yesterday, Robert Horton, chairman of British Petroleum and one of Britain's highest paid directors, set out to show that he is up there with the best.

Mr Horton took the stage for an annual meeting on a Hollywood scale. Britain's third-biggest company had seen one of its worst years in recent memory. Profits had plunged 85 per cent in the final quarter of 1991. The share price had fallen heavily and the 1,300 shareholders at the show wanted answers.

Mr Horton, who earned £787,000 last year, launched into a lengthy speech. "This annual general meeting takes place during one of the longest and most obstinate recessions since the Thirties," he said. "It's a recession which has left nobody unscathed, but some industries have been hit much harder than others. This time, I'm afraid, it's the oil sector's turn to be in the firing line."

Shareholders nodded glumly. This would explain why profits in the final quarter had crumpled from £456 million to £72 million. It would explain why the final dividend had been left, leaving them with a dividend increase barely matching inflation.

Mr Horton took extraordinary pains to explain what had gone wrong. Until October, BP had actually been doing quite well. The weak price of crude had hammered share prices across the oil sector. In Britain, BP had faced a tax bill which was "totally out of step" with its performance.

However, it was not all bad news. There had been a magnificent oil strike in Columbia and three North Sea fields were coming on stream. Fields under development would produce 200,000 barrels a day by 1995.

Not too long ago, rumours of a boardroom split at BP had sent the shares tumbling. Mr Horton wanted to set the record straight: "Times are tough at the moment and I do realise that recent events have been worrying to you. But I can't have been helped by some of the speculation and scaremongering in the press, which has been as wide of the mark as it is possible to be."

He sat down to thunderous applause. The directors braced themselves for hostile questions. Why was there no index in the annual report? Why were there no BP petrol stations in Jamaica? Would the company end up like Olympia & York. That was nasty.

The chairman was asked what he had done to justify his huge salary. Mr Simon was called "a wily old bird" for selling some share options before the price tumbled.

At last it was over, and the audience headed for the bar. Mr Horton and his team looked ready to join them.

Eagle offshoot sale raises £130m

By Neil Bennett, Banking Correspondent

EAGLE Star, the troubled insurance subsidiary of BAT Industries, has strengthened its balance sheet with the £130 million sale of Australian Eagle Insurance, its Australian subsidiary.

The group has split the business and sold the life assurance arm to Lend Lease Group, the Australian financial group, and the general insurance to QBE, an established Australian insurer.

Michael Heath, Eagle's marketing director, said the sale was part of a major reorganisation. The group is focusing on its business in Britain and continental Europe. "Australia has been a fair market for us, but not a strategic market, and this was sizeable enough as a disposal to have an impact on the balance sheet," he said.

Australian Eagle earned general insurance premiums of A$150 million (£66 million) and life premiums of A$187 million last year, and contributed £5 million to group profits.

Eagle is making a £75 million profit on the sale, which it plans to include in its second-quarter results, and will help to reduce the group's continuing losses. Eagle lost £394 million last year, up from a loss of £128 million in 1990, and is not forecast to return to profit until next year at the earliest.

Mr Heath said no other businesses were earmarked for disposal and that the group had decided to keep its businesses in South Africa and Hong Kong.

Insurance analysts welcomed the disposal because it will strengthen Eagle's reserves. The deal will increase the company's solvency margin, the measure of its claims paying ability, by 7 per cent. Kevin Phillips, an insurance analyst at Kleinwort Benson, said: "I was concerned that Eagle Star was inadequately capitalised, but now it looks as though it would be the second strongest capitalised insurer in the sector if it was separately quoted." He refused to increase his profit forecast, however, because Eagle Star, like other insurers, will suffer a rush of claims from last Friday's bomb in the City.

Group aims to sell £250m of its portfolio

By NEIL BENNETT

LONDON & Edinburgh Trust, the property group, crashed to a loss of £138 million (£35.1 profit) last year owing to the collapse in the value of its property portfolio. The group now plans to sell up to £250 million of its property portfolio over two years to rebalance the portfolio of SPP, its Swedish parent.

The plunge in LET's figures forced SPP, an insurance and pensions group, to inject a further £439 million in new capital and subordinated loans into the company. LET's operations are now being reorganised and it is selling all its overseas investments to SPP LET International, a new subsidiary of SPP in Brussels.

Peter Beckwith, LET's chairman, said the results reflected the severe deterioration in the property market. "I anticipate 1992 being a year of consolidation but look forward to resuming our normal growth pattern in the years beyond," he said.

Most of LET's loss was caused by a £121 million write-down on the value of its development portfolio, which includes the Bull Ring in Birmingham and a 33 per cent stake in Spitalfields, the former London fruit market.

LET also suffered a 10 per cent fall in the value of its investment portfolio which reduced its reserves by £60.5 million. During the year however the group continued to buy property, and transferred development properties into its investment portfolio.

Overall, the value of LET's investment portfolio rose by 18 per cent to £661 million during the year, and rental income increased by 38 per cent to £49.8 million, although Nick Sheehan, joint managing director described lettings as "patchy".

Shareholders' funds fell by 40 per cent to £250 million despite SPP's injection of £71 million in new capital. Debts have soared to £735 million (£496 million), including £414 million in subordinated loans from SPP.

Mr Sheehan said that SPP plans to concentrate on its investments in continental Europe and wants to reduce its British exposure. He said the group plans to reduce its British portfolio by a third to around £500 million, or 40 per cent of its worldwide property holdings. "The important thing is that SPP is a long-term investor as a pension fund tends to be," he said.

Mr Sheehan said that LET will also sell its non-property interests which include Owen Owen, the retail chain, financial services and health clubs. All these have been grouped into one company called LET Ventures. "We will sell in due course but the timing fortunately belongs to us," he said.

□ Lilley, the Glasgow-based building and construction group, has unwound its various joint venture activities with London & Edinburgh Trust in a move that pumps £18.2 million into the Lilley balance sheet, which also benefits from the £3.8 million sale of housing land in north-west England, and the £3.1 million disposal of a stake in New Hong Kong Tunnel.

Details of the various deals accompanied results for the year 1991, which showed a £5 million pre-tax loss after a £12 million exceptional provision relating to a writedown of the group's land bank. In 1990, there was a £14.1 million profit. The final dividend is cut to 1.0p (1.5p), making a total of 2p (2.5p) for the year.

Dwyer plans share swap to cut gearing

By JONATHAN PRYNN

DWYER, a London-based property company, that has its shares quoted on the Irish stock exchange, has announced a capital reconstruction.

The aim is to reduce gearing and bring closer the day when the company can pay an ordinary dividend.

The proposals mean holders of the company's convertible preference shares would swap these for ordinary shares on a one-for-one basis.

Payment of dividends on the preference shares has been suspended since last October, after property write-downs eliminated Dwyer's distributable reserves.

The company said the cumulative nature of the dividend was a drain on its resources and "impedes prospects for growth in the future". The removal of the preference dividend entitlement might enable the company "to resume the payment of dividend earlier than would otherwise be the case".

Dwyer intends to apply to an Irish court for approval to eliminate the deficit on the profit and loss account, in order to restore distributable reserves.

The reorganisation would reduce gearing from 400 per cent to 175 per cent and proforma net assets per share from 120p to 110p.

The company has received support for the proposals from the holders of 35 per cent of the ordinary shares and from 10 per cent of the preference shares.

Dwyer ordinary shares yesterday fell by 8p to 40p; the preference shares rose by 2p to 36p, reaching 44p at one stage.

Expanding despite decline: Michael Thompson, of Friendly Hotels, which has acquired two more sites

Friendly Hotels suffers profit setback

By MARTIN WALLER

THE effects of the Gulf war and the recession in the hotels trade sent pre-tax profits at Friendly Hotels, owner of London's New Connaught Rooms, back to £3.89 million in 1991, against £6.01 million in 1990. It was the first profit setback since 1986.

However, a 3.3p final dividend raises the total from 5p to 5.5p because of signs in recent weeks that the company was approaching an upturn in business. Henry Edwards, the chairman, said, Earnings per share, fully diluted, slumped from 25.3p to 15.5p.

Mr Edwards said: "The early part of the year was adversely affected by the Gulf war and other external factors, and while turnover recovered rapidly for a time, this improvement was not maintained." Last year, therefore, the effects of the recession could not be overcome, and trading in the early part of this year had remained difficult. Friendly Hotels' market share had, however, been maintained, Mr Edwards said.

Turnover fell 8 per cent to £28.7 million. The group decided last year to concentrate on hotels and sell its fast service restaurants and nursing home operations, giving rise to an extraordinary profit of £1.95 million.

Michael Thompson, managing director, said Friendly Hotels had bought two freehold sites near Loughborough, Leicestershire, and Cardiff, which would provide two hotels totalling almost 200 rooms to be open next year. The shares rose 6p to 190p.

Fitch-RS implements a design for recovery

By MATTHEW BOND

FITCH-RS, the design group, moved back into the black in the second half of 1991, after reporting a £680,000 loss at the interim stage. The pre-tax loss for the year was £417,000. In 1990, the company made a profit of £51,000.

Although turnover fell by a fifth to £18.1 million, operating profits doubled to £1.6 million, as the cost-saving programme launched by Martin Beck, who became group chief executive last year, began to take effect. Mr

Beck was formerly the president of Richardson-Smith, Fitch's American subsidiary.

The cost of that programme, some £483,000 of redundancy expenses, have been included in the £1.2 million exceptional item that led to the pre-tax loss. The company has spent more than £1.1 million on carrying out redundancies in the past two years.

Rodney Fitch, chairman, pointed out that the exceptional charge masked a second half pre-tax profit of £258,000. "At the operating profit level," he said, "I am satisfied that the company's performance points to the effectiveness of the restructuring and marketing measures we have taken."

The balance of the exceptional item comes from the £690,000 of rent paid on the group's former headquarters in Soho, which has proved difficult to relet since Fitch moved to its new offices in King's Cross.

That building cost £13.6 million to build but its value was written down to £7 million in the 1990 accounts and now stands at around £6.5 million. The borrowings associated with the move are still hurting the company, with net interest going from £7,000 receivable in 1990 to £853,000 payable last year.

Reducing net borrowings of £7.5 million and gearing of 260 per cent was the company's top priority, Mr Fitch said. A sale and leaseback deal on the King's Cross building remained the most likely way of achieving that objective.

Mr Fitch said the centre of gravity of the group's business was shifting away from Britain. Overseas markets now accounted for three fifths of fee income and continental Europe was performing particularly well.

However, the flow of business in the London office had improved in the second half. New projects had been undertaken for Woolworths, Boots, Warner Lambert and BT. "The positive trend in the second half of last year has continued in the first half of this year."

The company's distributable reserves are still exhausted and dividend payments cannot be resumed on either the preference shares or the ordinary shares (1.5p).

BY DELLA MASON

"If you're surviving then every Friday is good!"

New customers are offered a free introduction service. This includes a visit by Miss Rawley to advise on the right mix for a particular conservatory while meeting the customer's own tastes and predilections. Subsequently, customers can, without charge, ring for advice they might need on any feed-

She believes much of her success is down to choosing plants that thrive in the conditions offered by a particular conservatory. Miss Rawley hopes to attract more attention by exhibiting her exotic plants at the Hampton Court flower show in July.

The Times county-by-county guide by Peter Ball

DERBYSHIRE

1991: Britannic Assurance County Championship: 3rd (WS L5 D8). Refuge Assurance League: 15th (WS L11). Benson and Hedges Cup: Failed to qualify for quarter-finals. NatWest Trophy: First round.

1992 staff: C J Adams, K J Barnett (captain), S J Bass, I R Bishop, P D Bowler, A M Brown, D G Cork, S C Goldsmith, F A Griffith, M Jast-Jacques, K M Krikken, S J M Maher, D E Malcolm, J E Morris, O Mortensen, T J O'Gorman, A Richardson, P E Russell, R W Staddon, T A Twaite, A E Warner, P Whitham. Newcomers: Bishop (Trinidad, West Indies), Richardson, Twaite, Whitham. Departures: M Ashrauddin (India), J Foley, E McCray, B Roberts, Z A Sadiq.

THIRD place in the championship last year might even have surprised Derbyshire themselves. Expectations are high as a result, but Ashrauddin's 2,000 runs will take some replacing, putting a lot of pressure on Morris to take responsibility and play some big innings, and Adams and O'Gorman to develop from bit players into major supporting roles behind Barnett.

Unusually though, for the county where they used to whistle down the mineshaft for the next in an endless supply of strong, durable seam bowlers, there is a question about the pace attack. After his year's lay-off, Bishop has returned, but his fitness for the long slog has to be proved, and Malcolm broke down again in the West Indies after one impressive performance on the A tour, while Mortensen is approaching the stage where thought needs to replace speed and aggression. Player to watch: Dominic Cork. Second seasons tend to be testing ones, but if Derbyshire's senior seam-bowlers fail to last the pace, there will be a lot depending on last year's outstanding discovery.

1991: NatWest Trophy: First round.

1992 staff: P Bainbridge, P J Berry, D A Blenkinsop, I T Bohan, M P Brier, G Brown, S J E Brown, J A Daley, A R Fothergill, J D Glendenen, D A Graveney (captain), P W Henderson, S F Hughes, S Hutton, D M Jones, W Larkins, S M McEwan, P W G Parker, C W Scott, I Smith, G Whigham, J Wood. Newcomers: Berry (York), Botham (Worce), Graveney (Somerset), Hughes (Middle), Jones (Victoria, Australia), Larkins (Northants), McEwan (Worce), Parker (Sussex), Scott (Notts), Smith (Gloucester).

FOR good or ill, Ian Botham's towering presence will dominate the first new county for 71 years, and if he is inspired by the challenge they could surprise one or two teams along the way. Geoff Cook has recruited a powerful batting line-up, and one to score its runs quickly, too, with the two local players, Glendenen and Blenkinsop, no slouches in that department. On their day, Larkins, Parker and Botham should make them as attractive as any side in the competition.

Bowling, on the slow Durham wickets, is another matter. The fast bowler, John Wood, may have his moments away from home, but Simon Hughes will probably get all the work he wants, and more, and David Graveney, sometimes reluctant to use his slower arm, when captaining Gloucestershire, will not be able to afford such reticence in the North East.

Player to watch: Darren Blenkinsop. Well organised, and with an impressive temperament, a member of the England under-19 touring team last winter, he should be the first of Durham's batch of promising young players to make his mark.

length of their tail was troubling on occasion last year.

Malcolm Marshall, who has retired from Test cricket and also been appointed vice-captain of the county, may not have the blistering speed of old, but he has few equals in cunning and control, and will still bowl a few sides out. The pace back-up is more problematic, unless Kevin Shine comes on dramatically, but if Turner or Udal develop to support Maru, the spin attack could prove profitable in a good summer. A useful one-day side, they may lack the penetration to do well in the championship.

Player to watch: Shaun Udal. If he can translate last year's NatWest form into championship cricket, he could make an important contribution.

NO CHRIS Smith, but Tony Middleton could thrive with the greater opportunity, and rumour has it that Micky Stewart's impending retirement might provide David Gower, eager to earn a Test recall and make the 34 runs to beat Boycott's England record, with much-needed motivation, so runs should not be a problem, although the

THE batting looks sound, if not spectacular, with Taylor and Benson a solid pair, and a lot will be expected from Trevor Ward. Fleming played with panache and Marsh has made great strides as wicketkeeper-batsman.

The pace attack looks decidedly thin, however, with the departure of Merrick, who makes way for Hooper, and Igglesden will shoulder a heavy burden unless Ellison can recapture the inspiration of the days before his injury. Their spinners, then, look as though they will have a lot of work to do.

Player to watch: Carl Hooper. Capable of scoring a huge number of runs in the championship, his off spin will be equally important if Kent are to repeat last year's placing.

ESSEX

1991: Britannic Assurance County Championship: 1st (WS L5 D8). Refuge Assurance League: 6th (WS L4 T1 N/R4). Benson and Hedges Cup: Semi-final. NatWest Trophy: Quarter-finals.

1992 staff: S J W Andrews, D J Boden, K A Butler, J H Childs, D M Cousine, N A Foster, A G J Fraser, M A Ganiham, G A Gooch (captain), N Hussain, M C Lott, N V Knight, J B Lewis, W G Lovell, P J Pichard, D R Pringle, A C Richards, R J Rollins, D J Robinson, Nadeem Shahid, J P Stephenson, P M Such, L Tennant, T D Tooley, M E Waugh. Newcomers: Cousine, Robinson, Tennant (Leics), Waugh (NSW, Australia), Departures: Salim Malik (Pakistan), D E East (retired), C A Miller, A C Seymour (Worce), G Ecclestone.

LAST year's champions are expected to be there or thereabouts again. But it is tempting to wonder whether Neil Foster, who is likely to captain the side often, can repeat his heroics of last season, and whether the spinners will continue to prove so effective. Iltis makes a welcome return after the back injury that threatened his career, to augment further the seam bowling department which is already strengthened by Stephenson's sudden emergence, and his admirers believe the off spinner, Such, can develop further.

The return of Mark Waugh means that the old formula of fast-scoring batsmen to give the bowlers time and large targets to bowl at is unchanged. Nasser Hussain could score a lot of runs, the left-hander, Nick Knight, made a huge impression last year and Nadeem Shahid should fulfil the promise of two years ago.

Player to watch: John Stephenson. An established batsman about to become an invaluable all-rounder?

With Cowdrey concentrating, although not exclusively, on one-day cricket, they could do well in the NatWest Trophy or, with a bit of luck with the weather in the early stages, the Benson and Hedges Cup.

The bowling, though, will determine how good a season they have. Watkin had a dreadful A-team tour of the Caribbean, but is a good bowler in English - and Welsh - conditions, and Foster is promising. Croft is probably the pick of young English spinners at the moment, and so they will be quite happy with slow turners to play on.

Player to watch: Robert Croft. Full of confidence, he had an impressive season last year, a good winter, and should establish himself as the next England off spinner.

the bowling is thin, unless the off spinner, Marlyn Ball, can pick up from his promising display as the end of season.

Hinks arrives from Kent to give the fragile batting line-up a little more depth, but a lot will still depend on Athey and Wright, who contributed seven of Gloucestershire's 11 first-class centuries last season. Unless some of the young players, the coach, Eddie Barlow, proclaimed as so promising before he returned to his vineyard come through, a season of struggle looks unavoidable.

Player to watch: Justin Vaughan. English-born left-hand batsman and medium-pace bowler who impressed for both Auckland in the domestic competition and the young New Zealand team last winter.

1991: Britannic Assurance County Championship: 6th (WS L5 D7). Refuge Assurance League: 2nd (WS L2 T1 N/R1). Benson and Hedges Cup: Runners-up. NatWest Trophy: 2nd round.

1992 staff: P J W Alcott, M A Atherton, I D Austin, A A Barnett, G Chapple, G Cordingley, J P Coney, J J De France, N A Derbyshire, N H Fairbrother (captain), J Fielding, J D Fitt, S D Fletcher, G Fowler, J E R Gassan, M Hirst, W K Hogg, R C Hunt, G D Lloyd, P J Martin, D M Mendis, D K Morrison, M A Sharp, N J Speak, Stanworth, S P Titchard, M Widdows, G Valls. Newcomers: Barnett (Middle), Chapple, Cordingley, Fielding, Fletcher (York), Hirst, Morrison (Australia, New Zealand), Departures: Wainwright (Pakistan), D P Hughes (retired), T E Jesty (retired), T M O'Neil, M P Ward.

WHICH Lancashire will we see - the imperious machine of the first half of last season, or the undisciplined group of the second half? A top-heavy management structure may not help, but Neil Fairbrother's winter success should give him confidence for a testing first season as captain. There is a promising group of young players, supported by experience from Fowler and Mendis. Graham Lloyd needs to develop, with Speak, Titchard and, at the end of term, John Crawley all vying for a place.

Danny Morrison's outstanding will win some championship matches, but may prove too uncontrolled for one-day competitions, and Martin will need to fulfil his promise if the pace attack is to be more than ordinary. Atherton bowling again would be an asset.

White is confident of winning world crown

By PHIL YATES

THE Embassy world championship, which begins its 17-day run at the Crucible Theatre, Sheffield, tomorrow carries a record total prize fund of £850,000 and is of vital importance to the continued prosperity of the professional game.

Coming at the end of a season when snooker has taken its share of mostly unwarranted media criticism, the game needs to be the winner at Sheffield far more than any player.

Even the most enthusiastic supporter would agree that the general level of interest in tournament snooker is less than that of the mid-Eighties. Critics point out that a game played under uniform conditions - ie, on a 12ft by 6ft table - has limited permutations. The anti-snooker lobby also props up its case by bemoaning a dearth of characters and a saturated schedule - criticisms frequently levelled at other sports.

This world championship can answer the criticism, at least for a while, by producing a series of intriguing matches and, ideally, a close final. It would be the first since 1985, when Dennis Taylor became a household name by beating Steve Davis 18-17 on the final black before a record after-midnight television audience of 18.5 million.

Such a climax would be hard to repeat but David Harrison, nearing the end of his first year as chief executive of the World Professional Billiards and Snooker Association (WPBSA), confesses that something similar would be "pure Dreamville".

While Harrison is prepared to concede that a gripping final would benefit the game, he remains passionately opposed to the idea that snooker is in decline. "It is a total misconception, utter codswallop," he says. "There exists no evidence whatsoever that snooker is falling."

Given that television coverage, and therefore viewing figures, are the game's lifeline, it would appear that, for the most part, Harrison's argument stands up to scrutiny. The peak audience of 8,623,000 for the Benson and Hedges Masters final between Stephen Hendry and Mike Hallett last year was almost 900,000 higher than for the Wimbledon men's singles tennis final, and more than three million greater than the best viewing figures generated by the Open golf championship.

Only 944 spectators can watch any one session live at the intimate Crucible Theatre. However, 90 hours of coverage by the BBC will multiply the championship's exposure 5,000-fold to an average four million arm-chair enthusiasts.

Rick Waumansley, the producer in charge of BBC snooker, shares Harrison's optimism. "In my opinion, those who talk of a crisis are misinformed. Of the six networked finals so far this season, three have shown improved figures."

"That has got to be a positive sign, especially as it's now a more competitive arena than ever before. In terms of television, snooker is immeasurably more popular than sports such as rugby union, golf and tennis."

If a closely fought final, and the emergence of characters, are desirable attributes for the championship, then so is a popular winner. Jimmy White, beaten three times in the final, would satisfy this criteria. There is a widespread admiration of White's panache and a wave of sympathy for him caused by his succession of near-misses.

Confidence has certainly not been lacking in White's preparation. Hugely encouraged by back-to-back victories in the British Open and European Open last month, White has recently been unable to disguise an unparalleled degree of self-belief.

Not known for brash statements or bold predictions, White has even said: "Unless I get a terrible illness or someone plays like God, I will win the championship. I think snooker needs me to win as much as I need to myself."

Either White is indulging in mind games or, as seems more likely, he genuinely thinks this will be his year. He is renowned for his cue power, an asset directly related to timing. Victory at Sheffield on May 4, at such an important stage in the game's development, would be perfect timing in a much wider sense.

success, White would be favourite to end years of frustration in an event where he has been threatened by an opponent in three finals. White could hardly have wished for a better build-up. Last month, he became only the fifth player to win back-to-back ranking titles by prevailing in both the British Open and European Open.

James Wattana
Age: 26. Born: Bangkok. World ranking: 20. Provisional ranking: 25. 1991-2 prize-money: £167,000. Best world championship performance: Final qualifying round 1990, 1991. Ranking tournament wins: 1. Betting: 100-1.

By reaching the semi-finals of four important tournaments since November, and capturing his first ranking title in the Strachan Open last month, Wattana has emerged as a realistic candidate for the £150,000 first prize.

Peter Ebdon
Age: 21. Born: Islington. World ranking: 26. Provisional ranking: 28. 1991-2 prize-money: £7,250. Best world championship performance: None. Ranking tournament wins: Nil. Betting: 100-1.

What Ebdon, the world junior champion in 1990, lacks in experience is more than amply compensated by raw talent, unerring potting and an unshakeable belief in his own ability. He has negotiated nine qualifying rounds to figure in the final stages and became the youngest player to complete a maximum break in professional competition when he recorded a 147 in the pre-qualifying round of the Strachan Open.

White: self-belief

Hendry: firm favourite

Try worth five points to encourage attack

Board brings in new laws to speed up game

BY DAVID HANDS
RUGBY CORRESPONDENT

THE International Rugby Football Board (IRFB), having held its breath on law changes for the last four years, released it with a gusty sigh yesterday. Though the wording of the laws themselves has yet to be made known, a wide-ranging series of changes has been agreed with the intention of speeding up the game and removing what the board describes as "irritating stoppages".

The supremacy of the try over the goal-kick has been emphasised by changing its value from four to five points — the first change in values since 1971, when the try increased from three to four. Thus a converted try will be worth seven points, the negative side of which is that teams may feel able to risk conceding two penalty kicks (worth six points) without being overtaken.

However the value of the dropped goal, so historic a feature of rugby, remains intact at three points; the life of the 'drop' kick, too, is enhanced by its adoption as the way to restart after a score, although, in the sixth comprehensive review of the laws since the last century and the fourth since the second world war, players will be barred from dropping at goal following a free kick.

The IRFB, at the end of its annual meeting in Wellington, ran the gamut of business from amateurism to tours, but the greatest weight concerned the laws and the debate between the two hemispheres: the north, concerned with traditional aspects of the game, against the south, keen to offer an effective counter to rugby league.

In fact, the two may not be so far apart, since so much of rugby union's play hinges on interpretation. For example, the suggestion that the first player to reach a tackle must be on his feet when he plays the ball merely repeats a law which was applied so firmly by Jim Fleming, the Scottish referee, in the opening match of the World Cup.

"I would hope the changes would produce a more attractive spectacle, to give greater stimulus to pass the ball and run with it, rather than kick it," Roger Vanderfield, the board chairman, said. Certainly the laws may reduce set-piece play and encourage teams to become more creative, if they have the will to implement them positively.

Southern-hemisphere countries can introduce the changes as soon they wish, but Australia and Scotland already have an agreement that existing laws apply to the Scottish tour in May; the same will apply to Ireland in New Zealand, who aim to introduce the new laws on June 7. The Rugby Football Union has indicated its desire that the present laws apply to their B tour in New Zealand in June and July.

The question of eligibility for international matches remains unresolved, and will probably arise at the interim council meeting in November.

Among professionalised players reinstated as amateurs is Terry Holmes, the former Wales and British Isles scrum half, who signed league forms for Bradford Northern. Other reinstated are — England: D. K. Hill, S. D. Wilson, M. Chester; Scotland: D. M. Rose; Wales: M. Price, D. Watkins, E. V. Watkins, P. Bennett; Australia: C. Roche, A. D'Arcy. The gap between the last receipt of material benefit and reinstatement has been reduced from five to three years.

Two more countries, Bermuda and Lithuania, have been admitted to membership of the IRFB, but no further details will emerge of the 1995 World Cup in South Africa before the tournament organising committee has met the South African Rugby Football Union.

South Africa, confirmed this week as hosts of the 1995 World Cup, are to withdraw from their proposed tour of Romania and Italy in June, after criticism that they should concentrate first on a development programme for the black township. Their return to international rugby will now be against New Zealand on August 15.

County game's traditions will disappear under reforms

BY PETER BALL

COUNTY cricket is facing its biggest change since the introduction of the one-day game 30 years ago. The three-day match, the basis of English first-class cricket this century, will virtually disappear next season if the Murray committee proposals are accepted by the Test and County Cricket Board (TCCB) meeting on May 19.

The committee, which was set up in September under the chairmanship of Mike Murray to review the structure of the first-class game, has proposed radical restructuring of both the county championship and the one-day competitions. Only the NatWest Trophy survives untouched.

The Murray committee is the third, following the Clark Report and, three years ago, the Palmer committee to assemble a package of major changes. The two others failed to gain a majority, but Murray, the chairman of Middlesex and the Test and County Cricket Board (TCCB) finance committee, secured an air of quiet confidence yesterday.

"The Palmer committee made no attempt to explain the rationale behind the report to the counties, they just prepared and presented it, and that's why it didn't succeed," Murray said. "I'm optimistic."

This time, his committee has carried on extensive consultations. Suggestions yesterday were that there will be wide support. Lancashire, who were traditionally opponents, are supportive, and there were indications that Yorkshire will also fall into line.

Chris Hassell, the Yorkshire chief executive, said: "Our committee has always been opposed to a four-day championship but we may have to come to terms with the tide of current opinion. My initial view about the proposals which were made public today, is they have a lot of commendable aspects."

"I also don't think the fears of some counties about the proposed new structure will be substantiated."

If the recommendations are accepted, the county championship will consist of 17 four-day matches, all beginning on Thursday.

Teams will alternate between nine and eight home fixtures. The alternative view of retaining three-day games but uncovering the pitches was considered but rejected because of the priority given to Test cricket in the committee's deliberations.

"The working party took the view that Tests will never be played on uncovered pitches, and thought that England players would be playing with one hand behind their back if they went into Tests with inadequate practice in the conditions," Murray said.

That is bound to provoke some heated response from traditionalists, while the loss of cricket, with potentially serious consequences for their membership, will worry some counties, particularly those like Essex and Yorkshire who play a lot of cricket on out grounds.

A bigger change comes in the Sunday League, the bête noire of the purists but staff of life for the impecunious counties.

The committee recommends that the games should increase from 40 to 50 over a side, starting at 12, and finishing at 7pm, with a 40-minute interval at 3.10pm.

championship. That is also attractive, but the financial implications of the proposed reforms will concern the counties, although they are difficult to quantify.

Estimates of the effect of the changes to the championship range from a loss of £139,000 at one county on a worst case example to a profit of £76,000 at another county in the best case.

In all, with the changes to the one-day competitions also taken into account, counties are expected to lose around £20,000 to £25,000, a figure which the marketing arm believes will be quickly made up.

The changes to the one-day competitions are generally likely to prove less contentious. The format of the Benson and Hedges Cup will be altered, with the group matches abandoned in favour of a straight knockout competition.

Counties in the driving seat

CRICKET CORRESPONDENT

FOR the next month, English cricket will stand at the crossroads like a dithering motorist. The counties have been presented with a new and exciting direction, a by-pass to the wearisome congestion their game has increasingly suffered. Will they take the streamlined route, or sledge for the safety of the familiar road?

A working party, under Mike Murray, was set up amid general scorn. Why, it was asked, should it have any more success against reactionary tendencies than several similar committees in the past? Already, it has provided some compelling answers by approaching its task assiduously, consulting broadly, and adopting a refreshing openness.

If the proposals unveiled yesterday were not thought remarkable, it is because they are the very reforms for which players, coaches, media, umpires — indeed, almost everyone involved in the game — have been clamouring for some years. The dissenters, almost to a man, have been the committee men who now, of course, have the decisive voice.

Previous attempts to introduce a four-day championship and to improve the cricketing appeal of the Sunday League and Benson and Hedges Cup have met with objections put ostensibly on financial grounds but, in many cases, founded on parochial prejudices and a fear of the unknown.

Of course, there will be certain sacrifices to be made for the general good. Now, surely, they must be seen as worthwhile, because the framework for the 1994 season, which the working party has created, is more attractive for players and spectators than the confused mess of recent years.

Championship games would be played only once a week, and always on the same days. Sundays would contain a proper one-day game and Tuesdays would belong to knockout cricket.

The season would begin later, with more chance of civilised weather and none of the frustrating frustration of zonal one-day cricket, and would proceed in an organised, routine. The championship would be authentic, at last, each side playing the others once. The players would have so much travelling and Test players would play a higher proportion of games.

It all makes so much sense that I am filled with a perverse dread of the decision which will be announced on May 19. This time, it seems, the clubs cannot turn their backs on reform... but do not risk a bet on it.

TOMORROW

BY NICHOLAS HARLING

THERE will be new champions in each of Europe's three football club competitions next month. None of the six teams disputing the finals has won its respective trophy before, although Barcelona, Sampdoria's opponents in the European Cup final at Wembley on May 20, have finished runners-up on two occasions.

They also defeated Sampdoria 2-0 in the 1989 Cup Winners' Cup final in Bern, but unlike their rivals for the Spanish League, Real Madrid, the six-time European champions, it has never been Barcelona's privilege to win the main event.

Sampdoria, who have reached the final at the first attempt, return to the scene of their 1990 pre-season Makina Trophy success. Should they win again it will be the third triumph in four years for Italian clubs, AC Milan having done so in 1989 and 1990.

Theoretically the final should provide a fascinating contrast, Barcelona's adventurous approach against Sampdoria's slightly more cautious style, but if last year's final between Red Star Belgrade and Marseilles was an example of an anticipation best forgotten in reality, nobody will be expecting too much this time.

Between them the clubs have reached the Cup Winners' Cup final in each of the last three seasons. Both teams were favourites to advance from their semi-final groups, instigated for the first time this season and the subject of so much criticism.

The groups went down to the last games, with Barcelona needing to beat Benfica to ensure their place and Sampdoria requiring at least a point at home to Panathinaikos. Barcelona duly won 2-1 but at Wembley they will be without Amor in midfield after a second booking.

Sampdoria scraped a 1-1 draw against the Greeks, who thus failed to win any of their six games, but led this time after 26 minutes. The Italians levelled through Mancini but would still have qualified had they lost as Red Star lost 3-2 at Anderlecht.

In the Cup Winners' Cup, Monaco's 2-2 draw against Feyenoord in Rotterdam secured their place in the final on away goals after a 1-1 first-leg draw. They meet Werder Bremen in Lisbon on May 6, the first European final for both clubs, the first in this competition for a French club, and only the sixth in all for French clubs in Europe. None of the previous five has succeeded, not even Marseilles in spite of all the millions of francs spent in the attempt by Bernard Tapie, their president.

Tapie, incidentally, who is also the French urban affairs minister, and Marseilles, are one of nine French clubs under investigation by the fraud squad. The justice ministry has reopened inquiries into alleged embezzlement involving transfer fees.

Bremen, trailing 1-0 to Club Brugge, beat the Belgians 2-0 in the return, with Manfred Bockenfeld's sixth-minute goal decisive. The defender was later carried off after a collision with the Bruges goalkeeper, Danny Verlinden, but doctors told him that he had only bruised his shin that was feared to be broken.

Bockenfeld is expected to be available for the final but Oliver Reck will not be so lucky. Bremen's goalkeeper, booked in the second half, incurred his second yellow card of the competition.

terday after being hit in the chest by a signal rocket during the first half.

Three Belgians were arrested in connection with the shooting and a signal flare gun in their possession was confiscated. Altogether, police arrested 12 Belgians and nine Germans for rowdy behaviour.

Ajax Amsterdam, who have won everything except the UEFA Cup, reached the final of that competition despite being held 1-1 at home by Genoa, whose failure, 4-3 on aggregate, prevented a third successive all-Italian final. Torino, who beat Real Madrid 2-0 for a 3-2 aggregate win, will face Ajax in the two-leg final on April 29 and May 13.

The Belgian coach, Paul van Himst, has called an uncapped forward, Gunther Hofmann, into his 16-man squad for next week's World Cup qualifier against Cyprus. Hofmann, who plays for Ekeren, could replace the injured Luc Nilis, of Anderlecht.

Joel Bats, the French team's goalkeeper during its successful years of the 1980s, is retiring at the end of the season although he will continue as a coach for Paris Saint-Germain.

Sella confused by tour omission

BY CHRIS THAU

THE casual manner of the announcement that the senior French backs, Jean-Baptiste Lafond, Franck Mesnel and Philippe Sella, the captain during the five nations' championship, were going to miss the tour to Argentina indicated a degree of consensus by all concerned; players, coaches and managers. Not so, according to Sella.

"I have not been consulted and I don't understand the decision," he said.

Pierre Berbizier, the coach of the team, explained: "I spoke to Sella, Mesnel and Lafond and asked them to take a break from the game. I think they are worn out and I believe they need a rest in order to regenerate."

"I want to take to Argentina a group of young players to blood them for future competitions. We are all aware that we need a new side by 1995 and if we don't start to bring youngsters in somewhere we will be caught unprepared by the World Cup. I've told the three that I count on them for the Springbok series in the autumn," Berbizier said.

Sella, though, believes there is a more sinister motive behind the move. "There is a strong similarity between the way Camberabero and Lagisquet got the push and the way we are treated," Sella said.

"I'm not tired at all. The only person who could say whether I need a rest or not is myself. Besides, when you go on tour with a young side you need an old wise head around. The captain is part of the team and if you want to develop the side you need a captain as well, don't you?"

"And, what is going to happen to the captain who is taking France to Argentina when they come back? Are they going to drop him?"

The author of the plan to use the tour to Argentina to launch a new generation for the 1995 World Cup is Robert Paparemborde, a big influence in the French federation. However, while the idea to bring new talent into the ranks is commendable, the painful truth is that there is not a centre of Sella's quality in French rugby.

"I have learnt to conduct worship in small groups. You cannot sing the psalms. You do not attempt the Te Deum": Canon David Woodward at All Saints Church in Stoke Ash, Suffolk, one of four medieval churches in his benefice

Today, in a small medieval church in north Suffolk, Canon David Woodward will close his eyes and lead a handful of supplicants in contemplation of Jesus's suffering and death on the cross. Their thoughts will not be entirely sombre. The paradox of the Good Friday tragedy, according to Christian belief, is that the death of Christ opened the gates of everlasting life to mankind.

This consoling thought is helpful to Christians throughout the church. But in particular it helps the clergy, to some of whom every Sunday can seem like a living Good Friday, and who wonder if and when the Church of England will be resurrected from its century-long decline.

In some parishes, the resurrection will come this Sunday in more ways than one. Every year, Easter Sunday, along with the harvest festival and Christmas, sees a doubling and even tripling of congregations.

Clergy have also been encouraged by the most recent church attendance figures, which showed that the decline seems to have bottomed out, somewhat to the surprise of the church's own statisticians. According to the figures from Church House, the administrative headquarters, 1.155 million people attended Anglican services each Sunday in 1989, 24 per 1,000 of the population and the same proportion of the population as the previous two years. The figure in 1970, however, was 1.542 million, or 33 per 1,000.

Canon Woodward, aged 56 and a country parson for 20 years, has been in his present benefice since 1989. Rural dean of Hartismere, his living takes in four churches for six villages, including Thorndon, Rishanges, Stoke Ash, Thwaite and Wetheringsett. Populations vary between 80 and 600, and church attendance between ten and twenty.

Canon Woodward, a traditional evangelical who recently celebrated his 25th anniversary in holy orders, was depressed at first by small congregations. "I have never had enormous numbers come into my church," he says. "I have learnt the hard way that you cannot attempt to be a cathedral when you are a small parish church. I have learnt to conduct worship in small groups. You cannot sing the psalms. You do not attempt the Te Deum. You adjust the prayer book, you do not go woodenly through it."

"There are times when I go out on a winter's morning and face six people. I rush to the next church and face ten. Then I begin to wonder what it is all about. I have been angry and frustrated, but my faith has never been tested. I have always believed that God is there. It is just that I am not as conscious of Him on some days."

Like most country parsons, he lives on a perpetual financial knife-edge. "All the churches need money spending on them. People are pretty positive about that, even though there is not much money about. We seem to find it somehow. We are getting a new organ at

He remains optimistic. "I believe that God called me to this type of ministry. I speak with hope about the rural church. I am not despondent about it, even though it makes me angry sometimes."

"I find that the institution of the church is very wobbly in places. You cannot get people to sit on parochial church councils, become church wardens. Trying to get people onto the deanery synod is the nadir of anyone's experience. They cannot see the relevance of it. But talk to them about prayer, Bible study, faith and even meditation, and they warm to that."

He expects about 100 people in church this Sunday. "There is a residual faith and I do not knock that. But I am obviously frustrated that I do not see them at other times. When I am visiting them, I try to work on what is there rather than condemn what is not."

The Church of England is organised through a system of parish boundaries which was firmly established by the early medieval period, when every member of the population of 2.5 million was in close contact with the church and parish priest.

The end of the last century and the beginning of this are often seen as the golden age of the rural church. But as the Archbishops of Canterbury and York's report Faith in the Countryside points out, it was during this period that the general perception of rural ministry as being the church's second eleven, a backwater suitable for the less energetic and able, began to establish itself.

Resurrection of hope

In 1899 Archbishop Randall Davidson blamed the bicycle for having a particularly deleterious effect on church attendance, and the first world war brought further changes to social conventions. In numerical terms, the church has never recovered. From the turn of the century the number of clergy began to decline from its peak of more than 25,000 in 1901. Each rural deanery has lost one clergyman every 15 years this century.

In the 1920s, the policy of providing a clergyman for every parish was abandoned. By 1931 the number of Anglican clergy had fallen by more than 6,000. Today there are about 10,500 clergy nationwide, and rural deanery can find themselves ministering to more than six parishes each, with no curate or secretarial help.

The Rev Michael Braithwaite, aged 57, has three churches in the Buttermere Valley in the Lake District. He does not fit the traditional picture of a country parson. He came to the ministry 18 years ago after a diverse career which took in time as a hill shepherd, dairy herdsman and eight years spent among South American Indians.

Today he will lead a three-hour pilgrimage to churches in Buttermere, Loweswater and Lorton through some of the most stunning scenery in England. He expects to collect about 45 churchgoers en route.

More than 80 people attend his combined Sunday services, with numbers often swelled by visitors. From a total population of about 500, this means an attendance rate better than in most towns.

"At Easter we get 150 and we are completely packed out at Christmas," he says. "If you feel you are one with the congregation and are getting a response, size need not be of the essence. There is no need to be put off by a small congregation. It is great when we get 150 and raise the roof."

He is careful not to criticise those who turn out only for the festivals. "Thank goodness they come," he says. "I do not get frustrated about that. I know farmers are looking after stock and coming to church is difficult."

Canon Humphrey York, aged 63, has two parishes, Antony and Sherrock, in Cornwall. He says about a dozen people go to church in the former, and up to 50 in the latter. "I have been in the ministry in the country for 30 years," he says. "One of the first things you learn is patience. You do not get results in five minutes."

In the smaller parish, which has an aging population, more people receive communion at home than go to church. As an Anglo-Catholic, Canon York has a reputation for revitalising worship while adhering to tradition.

"In my last benefice, in mid-Cornwall, one parish had a very small congregation, about eight people. My predecessor had died there. So had his predecessor, and so had his. The last incumbent to leave the parish in anything other than his coffin was in 1908, and he outstayed his welcome for 30 years, going on until he was 88," Canon York built the congregation up to about 40.

Canon York trained at St Chad's in Durham, where he was taught and ordained by Michael Ramsey, future Archbishop of Canterbury. "You go into the ministry with great confidence, thinking things are bound to get better," he says. "My only object was to serve. I think you assumed in those days that by working away diligently you would get a response."

"In some ways it is better. There is a much deeper sense of commitment among many church people. There used to be a general feeling that most people were Christians and they could go to church when they liked. That has disappeared."

He writes a fresh sermon every week. "Once a sermon is delivered, it goes in the waste paper basket. It belongs to that Sunday and that year only. I used to keep them, but then they disappeared. I take one week to think about it, one hour to write it and ten minutes to deliver it. I know people take note. They might not say anything straight away but they often do later on."

Earlier in his ministry, he experienced doubt and depression. "Doubt, not that the faith is untrue, but doubt in the sense of 'Can I keep me going?' But then most lives have a great deal of personal setback and difficulty. The clergy are no exception."

"In some ways they are worse off, because they are expected to keep going and look cheerful. We are not allowed the luxury of a good howl, although I do it when nobody is looking."

A frisson of excitement must have been felt by the three churchgoers in the tiny hamlet of Creacombe, Devon, when the Rev Laurence Meering, aged 43, a former chemistry teacher, arrived in their midst. His benefice also takes in Witheridge, Worlington, Thelbridge and Meshaw.

Mr Meering is a charismatic evangelical. He asked that I pray with him over the telephone before agreeing to an interview. Since he arrived in his new benefice in 1987, he says local churchgoers have experienced "gifts of the spirit", such as speaking in tongues. A regular prayer and praise roadshow, organised by Mr Meering and neighbouring vicars, has filled churches which have been virtually empty for decades. For most services, however, he still uses the 1662 Book of Common Prayer.

At Creacombe, they rarely sing hymns. "It is not worth it with so few," Mr Meering says. "We import an organist for harvest, Easter and Christmas."

"I have been in the ministry for nearly 11 years, but am more of a townie and am still feeling my way in the country. They are being very forbearing here. Sometimes I come away thinking it is a waste of time, but I found it very helpful to hear of someone in a similar position, who was asked how he went on preaching to such a small number, time and time again."

"He said it is not just the people who are there; the angels are listening also. We proclaim the word of God to all the invisible powers, as well as to the visible humans."

Hallelujah chorus: Laurence Meering brings charismatic evangelism to his flock in rural Devon

GALLERIES: LONDON

Never afraid of acting up to painters, caricaturists and to photographers, George Bernard Shaw in his ubiquitous prime became the most instantly recognisable writer of the day. The images he generated fill the National Portrait Gallery's GBS In Close Up exhibition with unquenchable provocation and humour. But the surprise of the show is the early Shaw, who waited a remarkably long time before presenting his fully-formed GBS persona to the Victorian world.

Far from conquering literary London overnight, as an enfant terrible spawned by his native Dublin, Shaw only made his debut as a playwright at the age of 36. Before then, he was known as either a critic or a novelist, and the first memorable portraits of him show a man emerging from obscurity with diffidence. Self-consciously placed against a backdrop of leaves in Battersea Park, the writer narrows his eyes for a camera held by the fine-art printer Emery Walker. His stiff smile cannot hide the scepticism with which Shaw views the lens, as he shelters beneath the shadow of a broad-brimmed hat.

At that time, as well as reviewing music for The Star under the pseudonym Corno di Bassetto, he was art critic of The World. One of his columns was scornful of the routine society portraiture churned out by Herkomer and pompously paraded at the Royal Academy. Perhaps he feared the prospect of turning into an effigy as dedicated as Herkomer's sitters.

Photography was different. Posing for Walker ended up beguiling Shaw so much that he became fascinated by the camera's possibilities. He acquired a camera of his own, and soon gave rein to strange, narcissistic fantasies. Around 1898 he photographed himself, the sylph-like product of a vegetarian diet, in a one-piece bathing costume. Then he posed naked on the beach, and a few years later nude at his writing desk.

The inhibition had been replaced by shameless showmanship. His new friend Harley Granville-Barker was obliged to photograph Shaw's bared flesh on the seashore at Mevagissey, but he assumed a less brazen mien when sitting for Rodin in 1906. Flattered by having his bust carved by such a renowned sculptor, Shaw was further gratified when Rodin likened his face to Christ's.

Such compliments are not, however, guaranteed to nurture incisive portraits. Both the bronze and marble versions of Shaw's bust were unrevealing, even dutiful. Their bland placidity made a nonsense not only of the sitters' innate restlessness, but of Rodin's own legendary dynamism.

As Shaw described it, the sculptor liked "taking a big draught of water into his mouth and spitting it on to the clay to keep it constantly pliable. Absorbed in his work, he did not always aim well and soaked my clothes." Shaw was also astonished by the mutilations Rodin inflicted on his features, slicing off noses and ears with such surgical efficiency that the sitters' wife "expected to see the already terribly animated clay begin to bleed".

No sign of these alarming struggles was allowed to disturb the finished busts. They err on the side of discretion, and the only sculptor to seize something of Shaw's ceaseless vitality was Epstein. Although the playwright was 78 by the time this furrowed bronze was modelled in 1934, his wildly protuberant eyes and turbulent beard have the unruly energy of an Old Testament prophet.

The impetuous action of Epstein's finger and thumb are forcefully preserved in a head which conveys Shaw's eccentricity as well as his visionary fervour. But the sinner recoiled from the result, claiming that he looked like a "primitive barbarian" and refusing to have the head in his house when Epstein offered it as a present.

Although Shaw bequeathed a substantial part of his royalties to the National Gallery of Ireland, he showed no great passion for either sculpture or painting. But the camera continued to be a consuming interest, and in 1904 he championed the young American photographer Alvin Langdon Coburn after his arrival in London. Coburn, approaching his peak, rewarded Shaw's enthusiasm by publishing some refined portraits of the playwright in his Men of Mark book.

His most arresting studies of Shaw are, however, the least formal. In one audacious 1908 photograph, over half the picture is devoted to the shadows of branches cast by the evening sun. Their sinewy elongation chimes with the playwright's own figure, resting in a diagonal direction on a tree-trunk as he jots down some notes in a pocket-book. Equally powerful is an image of Shaw and H.G. Wells. The mood is convivial, with Wells's relaxed face inclining at a jovial angle in his friend's direction. Shaw savours the mellowness as well, but his head remains upright and gazes out of the picture with a more questioning expression.

Did he ever really unwind? The torrential volume of his output bears all the marks of a workaholic. Even when he posed for Augustus John in 1915, closing his eyes while the session proceeded, the outcome was the opposite of somnolent. Shaw's ruddy features retain all their resolution as he allows the next passage in a play or article to burgeon in his mind. The demand for Shaw's work was by then incessant, and rewarded with remuneration far grander than John commanded. He recalled later that Shaw had exclaimed "when I informed him of my fee", and asked: "Do you mean to say you work for so paltry a sum?" But before John had time to revise his charges, "the cheque was written and handed over".

By this stage, the success of Pygmalion had turned Shaw into a towering figure. When Alick Ritchie gently caricatured him for Vanity Fair, he was presented as a cocksure celebrity in a cowboy hat and a long, checked coat. While one eye winks, the other stares out with laser-like sharpness. In his capacious pocket a copy of Caesar and Cleopatra is attributed to "Shawespeare".

The award of the Nobel Prize in 1925 gave him still greater stature. Sir Bernard

Grandfatherly: Dame Laura Knight's oil of GBS, from the collection of the Hereford City Museum & Art Gallery

Partridge's Punch portrait of that year depicted Shaw as a supremely assertive figure. With white brows lowered in a commanding frown, he places hands on hips like a headmaster terrifying an unruly pupil. Dame Laura Knight found herself painting him while he sat, simultaneously, for the sculptor Sigismond de Strobl. Conflict arose between the two artists: Knight wanted him to remain still, while de Strobl asked Shaw to adopt a variety of positions. Perhaps the difficulties militated against the painter, who produced an excessively genial, grandfatherly image. "You made me a sincere man," Shaw complained, "and all my life I have been an actor."

In the end, though, even Shaw grew tired of portraiture. When John requested another sitting in 1947, the 91-year-old "sage of Ayot St Lawrence" turned him down. Declaring that he was incapable of posing for half an hour, Shaw pointed out that he was just an elderly man in a white beard. The old show-off was tired out, and had no desire to see his decrepitude immortalised on canvas.

● GBS In Close Up continues at the National Portrait Gallery (071-306 0055) until July 5.

The Royal Shakespeare Company's latest rediscovery among 17th-century plays is A Jovial Crew, by Richard Brome, Ben Jonson's servant. Clare Colvin reports

Ann Catley sang Rachel in a 1770 production of an operatic version of Richard Brome's A Jovial Crew

The Royal Shakespeare Company can sometimes be thought of as an excavating business, digging away into the debris of 300 years to unearth forgotten plays. Only recently came Thomas Shadwell's The Virtuoso, which had remained on the shelves for nearly three centuries, transferred from the RSC's Stratford base for a London airing. Now it is the turn of Richard Brome's A Jovial Crew, which is in preview at Stratford's Swan Theatre, having lain undisturbed since the 18th century.

Brome (pronounced Broom, as in new), a servant of Ben Jonson, was a self-educated man who was encouraged by his master to read the playwright's library. His first success came around the time of the failure of Jonson's own The New Inn, which rather cooled their relationship. A Jovial Crew was written in 1641, in the shadow of the civil war, and was one of the last plays to be performed before the theatres were closed. Its last known performance as a play was in 1742, though it was turned into an opera and, in 1770, performed by a cast including the celebrated singer Ann Catley (who also sang Polly in The Beggar's Opera).

There are historical reasons for its lapse from favour. As the RSC's artistic director Adrian Noble says: "People thought that theatre in the Caroline period was like a valley after a great mountain of achievement by Shakespeare, Middleton and Jonson, but there are many treasures which are a crucial link between Shakespeare and Farquhar and Restoration plays."

Max Stafford-Clark, who is directing Jovial Crew, sees it as a coded message from the past, written at a time when criticism of the government could not be voiced directly, and the playwright acted as journalist. The story, about two young women who run away from home to join a band of beggars, deals with the growing problems of the homeless at that time. It is, he says, an allegory seeking to raise public consciousness of the irresponsibility of both Parliament and the King. Unlike The Virtuoso, which is played as written, but cut to under three hours from its original four and a half, A Jovial Crew has been reworked in the second act by Stephen Jeffreys, whose plays include Valued Friends and The Clink. The songwriter Ian Dury has re-written the lyrics.

"The play sets up a fascinating plot and then withdraws from it," Jeffreys explains. "One senses that Brome was imprisoned by elements of self-censorship and the second half was a series of set pieces that did not add to the plot. The basic shape is the same, but I have taken the characters he has created and pushed them further. It is like restoring a painting. You try to be faithful to the colours of the original."

What the RSC calls its "discovery" plays are the result of what Noble calls "endless trawls, both collectively and independently". The literary manager or dramaturge, Colin Chambers, hies off to The London Library to search out plays that are drawn to his attention by academics such as Anne Barton, an authority on Caroline drama.

Shakespeare's plays open themselves up anew each time they are played, whereas Jonson or Marlowe, as Chambers admits, "sit less easily on our ears and on our minds. I don't believe people will be rushing to repeat The Silent Woman or The New Inn."

But the successes outweigh the failures, if one recalls the surfacing of such gems as The Rover, written in 1677, Wild Oats (1791) and also later neglected plays like Bourcoul's London Assurance (1841).

Adrian Noble says: "By increasing the number of discovery plays we are building up an audience with an appetite for the brand new experience of an unknown play. It may be in future that somewhere such as the Theatre Cwyd, in Wales, will put on The Virtuoso instead of another School for Scandal."

● A Jovial Crew opens at the Swan Theatre, Stratford (0789 295623), on Tuesday.

TELEVISION REVIEW

The authority of the law and the certainty of science make a powerful alliance. Judge and jury are often swayed by the confident tones of the expert witness presenting evidence they do not have the knowledge to assess properly. Seldom is the same expertise brought to bear for the defence, for in Britain forensic science has been used overwhelmingly as a means of securing convictions, not acquittals.

The dangers were made painfully apparent by the wrongful convictions of the Birmingham Six. Taking Liberties last night on BBC 2 looked at some less celebrated cases and produced evidence that science and pseudo-science are being used as blunt instruments in Britain's criminal courts.

Peter Noble, charged with rape, faced evidence linking fibres found on the victim to clothing removed from his wardrobe by police. Refused legal aid to challenge the findings, Noble was lucky that his family raised the £3,000 needed for independent advice. The expert they consulted, Dr Angela Gallop of Forensic Access, contested the Home Office evidence, claiming that the fibres were of a common type.

After seven months in jail awaiting trial, Noble was acquitted. "It's a big gamble, isn't it?" he said. "Like having a bet on the horses." The majesty of the law might demur at being compared to a punt at the bookies, but he had a point.

Jason Williams, a 21-year-old, was convicted of a rape after evidence was given that his teeth matched bite marks on the nose of the victim. This time, two experts gave evidence, one for the prosecution and the other for the defence. The jury chose to believe the prosecution's man, and Williams is consequently serving five years in youth custody. The point made by Taking Liberties was that convictions made on the basis of scientific findings cannot be secure unless both prosecution and defence have access to the same science. No ordinary person can form a sensible opinion of the evidential value of a fragment of fibre without an expert witness to interpret it. But if the expert witnesses are all appearing for the prosecution, that leaves the accused in jeopardy.

What is the answer? Independent forensic scientists believe that changes in the legal aid provisions are needed to restore the balance between prosecution and defence. "Science and the law should admit how fallible they can be," reporter David Jessel asserted. It seemed a conclusion amply justified by events.

Sense and sensitivity

'Knowledge-base non possessors' can take comfort in a new guide to the intricacies of political correctness

Let us say you are finely tuned to the nuances of political correctness, the creed of sensitivity that has swept from American universities into the public discourse in the past three years and now across the Atlantic.

You would, for example, never refer to a man in a wheelchair as a handicapped man but as a challenged person. You would always describe a backward schoolgirl as an exceptional child. You would never dream of saying someone was black, preferring African American.

But in using these coinages, correct as recently as a year ago, you would be making thoroughly "inappropriate choices", to use two arch-PC words. You would be committing the sins of "ableism" and racism because the handicapped are now called the differently-abled.

Better still, turn the thought around and refer to the abled-bodied as "temporarily abled persons". The schoolgirl, and this is not a joke, should be called an "exceptional prewoman" because "exceptional" implies exclusion and girl is sexist. On race, non-whites must now be called persons of colour, or more specifically, members of the African diaspora.

When it comes to bending over backwards to avoid offending the sensibilities of "oppressed" groups, which is what the PC mentality is all about, the language police move swiftly, purging any hint of judgment. Help is on the way for all those who want to avoid being considered "knowledge-base non-possessors" (ignorant). Later this month they can turn to The Official Politically Correct Dictionary and Handbook, a compilation of terms by Henry Beard and Christopher Cerf, to be published by Villard Books in America and by HarperCollins in Britain in December.

The handbook itself violates a cardinal rule of political correctness, the one prohibiting "inappropriately directed laughter." Though tongue in cheek, the book draws on terms from respectable published sources, but many of its entries come from the loonier fringes of animal rights, ecology and feminism.

A few years ago, for example, pet was purged from sensitive discourse in favour of animal companion. That implies "speciesism" so you should now refer simply to your companion. Wives or girlfriends should be called unpaid sex workers, and the gender-sensitive should jettison "himself" and herself "coself", a term widely found in feminist writing.

In the fast-expanding field of sexual harassment, the compilers have unearthed such nuggets as "receptive non-initiator", a term used in a New York University text. This is the "man guilty of allowing himself to be seduced by a woman in a subordinate position to himself".

However, the dictionary lists dozens of widely used terms and serves as a useful lesson in the way PC, for all its excesses, colours the way people talk in America and, increasingly, in Britain.

Some of it is merely an extension of the American love of euphemism noted in the last century by such eminent visitors as Charles Dickens. The desire to soften unpleasant concepts such as age, death or crime gave the world senior citizens, morticians and "correctional systems", the now standard term for prison. (Example: Leona Helmsley this week became a client of the correctional system.)

In the past five years, other euphemisms have entered general speech. In deference to the self-esteem of toddlers, newspapers refer to "kindergarten students". Substance abuse is now the general term for drug or alcohol addiction and sexually dysfunctional is the term for what used to be known as perverted. All that PC culture has done is extend the process so that a serial killer may be called a "socially misaligned" person. If his speciality is, say, cannibalism, he can be termed a "person of difficult to meet needs", as the handbook notes.

The compilers call the process the Whorf-Sapir hypothesis, after Benjamin Lee Whorf and Edward Sapir, two academics who argued that "before we can change a pattern of behaviour, we must change the terms which relate to it".

At the heart of PC lies the dogma of diversity, the idea that America needs new language to break from a culture

'If a man's speciality is, say, cannibalism, he can be termed a 'person of difficult to meet needs'

stapled by DWEMs (dead white European males) and still dominated by the "white patriarchy". This leads the handbook to advise avoiding using terms such as "academic freedom", a DWEM notion if ever there was.

The prevailing duty of a university teacher is not to express his or her coself but to create a better world, according to the PC view. The true PC person writes unreadable prose in order to identify with the oppressed or those who are simply too "motivationally dispossessed" (lazy) to do otherwise.

The PC culture, springing from the left-wing outlook of the middle-aged academics who dominate the universities, is still well removed from the American mainstream but is making solid inroads. This is because it chimes with the way the country is fleeing from risk and moral judgment into the realm of "victimology". Every guest on a talk show is a "survivor" of some kind, blaming everything from alcoholism to bankruptcy on negligent parents or low self-esteem.

In Santa Cruz, California, the town council has given provisional approval to another pioneering step: a by-law prohibiting "lookism" in the recruiting of employees. This is designed to protect from discrimination the differently sized (fat), the folklorically challenged (bald), the commercially different (ugly) or the plain chronologically gifted (old) and perhaps the charm-free (boring). The key is avoiding anything that smacks of judgment or hurts the feelings of any member of a minority.

The dotter extremes of the PC mentality will no doubt eventually succumb to good old American common sense, but not before it has robbed the language of some old-fashioned but healthy words.

Alice Thomson experiences the charm offensive of Gillian Shephard, the new employment minister

John Major's iron lady

She was only a farmer's daughter: Gillian Shephard's background gave no clue to her inner steel

The security guard was adamant there was no Gillian Shephard in the employment department. He looked the name up in the directory, she wasn't there. "I think she is your new minister," I said. "Mike, who's our new boss?" he shouted. "A woman," Mike shouted back. "I think she's called Shephard."

Engulfed in her vast new offices on the sixth floor the diminutive Mrs Shephard is highly amused. "Nobody knows me," she says delightedly. "Why should they? I just tell people I'm the one that looks like Edwina Currie."

With her snappy suit, comically arched eyebrows and bouffant hairstyle, the new Minister of Employment does bear a startling physical resemblance to her colleague.

Mrs Shephard is one of two women to be promoted by John Major to his new cabinet. An MP for only five years, her rise has been swift and largely overlooked by the public. She was a key member of Mr Major's leadership team and became the highest ranking woman ever in the Treasury when she was made a minister of state. She has consistently been singled out for praise by Mr Major and was given a prominent role during the election campaign as the deputy party chairman, chairing some of the daily press conferences.

While at Conservative Central Office she kept the young Turks going on take-away pizzas and insisted on eating in the canteen. Her constituents in Norfolk fondly recount how she managed to get the entire village of Marham double glazed at public expense against warplane noise. Her colleagues say she will always use charm instead of force.

"I feel as though I have known her for three years, not 24 hours. She's lovely," says the senior press officer as he ushers me into the room. Mrs Shephard offers a glass of water. "Oh help, I think you have been given the flower vase," she says and squeals with laughter.

Mr Major said he would promote women to the cabinet only on merit, but Mrs Shephard really tough enough for the job? She has no doubts. "People who have worked with me in a ministerial capacity know that I am not likely to be walked over. I haven't been in any stage of my life and I've had quite tough things to do before I ever came to the cabinet," she says, brandishing a letter from a county council colleague of former days who has written: "I wonder if some of the union leaders know what they have got coming to them. They will be shaken by your clarity of thought and ability to turn their arguments back on them."

She admits to using a certain amount of feminine charm. "Women do seem to do things in one way and men in another. I seek solutions before I go for confrontation. I also try to listen. Nothing is so unacceptable as turning down arguments without actually listening to them. I think it is insulting to human beings. And so does the prime minister," she says, with more steel in her voice than charm.

Mrs Shephard, 52, has more political experience than her relative brief sojourn in the House suggests. After reading French and Latin at Oxford university, she held a variety of jobs in local government in Norfolk, ending up as the county council deputy leader, and has run several health authorities. There was one period when she was simultaneously the chairman of the local health and the local education committees, on the mental health acts commission and a magistrate.

In 1975, at 35, she married Tom Shephard, then a headmaster of a local comprehensive school and a widower, and inherited two young sons.

She was nervous about being a stepmother but put a hold on her career for ten years to look after them. After the count on election night, her Labour voting step-son, Neil, drove her four hours back to Central Office so she could celebrate.

At the age of 46, long past the normal sell-by date for would-be MPs, Mrs Shephard decided to stand as Conservative candidate for South West Norfolk, after the constituency turned down Central Office's non-local candidate. With little time to look for an alternative, she opted for Mrs Shephard, on the grounds that as a Norfolk farmer's daughter, brought up among chickens and livestock, she was unlikely to cause much of a stir. Five years later she is in the cabinet.

Even Mrs Shephard is startled. "Well I must say it is fairly quick, isn't it? I mean I do not know whether that is a record," she says and then sounds rather embarrassed at her forthrightness.

Her life has always been crowded, so she understands balance and is not worried about taking on the employment department, dealing with local constituency affairs and spending time with her husband. "Women are more conscious of getting a healthy balance in life because they have come into politics later. It's a phase in your life, not your whole life," she says. "There is a tendency for ministers to get taken over which I will resist."

Considering she has always stressed that the two most important ministries are the treasury and education, wasn't Mrs Shephard slightly disappointed with her lot? "I'm thrilled," she says. "Clearly, if you're offered anything in the cabinet you must be delighted but when I saw in the manifesto that this job was going to be enhanced by the addition of jobs to do with women I thought 'goodness, how very interesting'. Then there is all the employment law, the reform of the industrial relations act, sex discrimination, race discrimination, industrial tribunals..."

Mrs Shephard wasted no time in getting down to work. On Sunday she immediately summoned her officials for a meeting and made clear she wasn't going to waste her time promoting "artificial initiatives which don't mean anything. I don't forget that people of both sexes are out of work and that's a horrible thing for themselves and their families," she says. "What we want is for the economy to start turning again so that jobs come back, because only business can actually create jobs. In the meantime our priority must be to supply good training."

On what she describes as "women's issues", Mrs Shephard will look to improving childcare, although she does not believe that this alone is the key to better opportunities. "What really matters is increasing women's confidence, whether they are about to enter the jobs market or are returning after having a family," she says. "I suffered a real loss of identity when I gave up work and I found it very difficult returning. I had gone from a position where I had a secretary and staff to a job where I was the staff and doing the photocopying and dogdodging."

She would also like to see more women in the House of Commons and is close friends with women members as diverse as the Conservative Anne Widdecombe, with whom she shared an office, and Labour's Clare Short. She finds some of her male colleagues' bawling behaviour demeaning. "I don't think we have got nearly enough women in yet. If we get more it will make a difference to behaviour, there's no doubt about it," she says.

Of her fellow female cabinet minister, Virginia Bottomley, the new health secretary, she comments: "I admire her ability. I admire her looks enormously. She's just marvellous to look at isn't she? It's just great to have her zooming about looking tremendous." No male colleague would dare to say this in public.

In the cabinet she feels ideologically closest to Mr Major. "He sees that you have to bring people round slowly to your way of thinking, have sound economic policies and keep a firm grip on public spending," she says.

She is also polite about Michael Heseltine's "dazzling role" in the election, but one feels that isn't quite her style. She doesn't think she wants endless Tory rule. "The prospect of one party rule is rather unhealthy, but I don't think it will happen in real life. People will vote themselves out of it in the end," she says, before getting up to go.

She is off to see the Queen to be made a privy councillor. "My father is thrilled," she says. "I've just realised that I will be the right honourable for the rest of my life, that's rather nice don't you think, rather a boost."

Autism denies its victims normal human contact. Now a sufferer has described her remote, inner world

Donna Williams has her own set of rules for interviews. First she must meet the reporter the day before, preferably in a quiet, green place. No "interview" questions must be asked: small-talk only. Then she must be faxed a list of questions, to which she sends long written replies. At no time must the interviewer shake hands, crack jokes, show emotion, use metaphors, vary their tone or switch topics suddenly. Otherwise Ms Williams may become stressed and run for it. Add to these conditions the normal hectic juggling of schedules imposed by a publisher convinced it has a hot property, and she is not the only one who gets stressed.

But Ms Williams, a 29-year-old Australian, is worth it. And her conditions are as reasonable as if a normal interviewee should ask reporters not to hit her, sob, or shout questions in Chinese. Normal subjects do not have to make such stipulations because their social and verbal perceptions are those of the majority: Ms Williams' are not. To her a handshake is an ordeal, the emotion of others a threat, and elliptical sentences a garble. She is autistic, severely so, and has written a book about her life.

To my question on how she sees new people she replied: "Their language is difficult to follow and miles away from their movements anywhere from distracting to annoying to frightening." Crowds overload her entirely. "Sometimes the meaning drops out of things and what I see or hear is reduced to basic colour, shape, pattern and sound."

Autism is a strange, barely understood abnormality apparent from infancy in four children in every 10,000. Sufferers cannot process information properly, particularly human expressions, allusions and gestures. Autistic children typically avoid eye contact, hate being touched, and show no emotion except fits of rage. A puzzle or a pattern absorbs them utterly, but conversation is met with parrot repetition or with silence. Despite their frequent great intelligence, they are desperately hard to get along with: their stiff chilliness baffles, sometimes alienates, their parents.

But Ms Williams has written about the process from the other side: right from the moment in her cot when the air was full of lovely patterns and "people would walk by obstructing my magic view of nothingness". Her inability to communicate and co-operate was met in her working-class Melbourne home with violence and abuse from her mother. "How can I blame her when all efforts to reach me resulted in self-abuse because I wanted no one near me? When the only way she could find to stun me into stopping trying to tear my skin off with my teeth was to hit me?"

At school she was perceived as intelligent but devoid of sense, and found rules incomprehensible: tell her not to draw on the wall and she would stop, but start again in a moment because in her logic only the earlier moment contained the prohibition. In her teens she became a sexual victim in return for shelter. "I hadn't even reached the stage where I realised my body belonged to me. I took it as coincidence that it was stuck on me... I suffered abuse at the hands of a well-intentioned but ignorant foster mother practising hug therapy, and men capitalised on my having been taught to tolerate touch in spite of it making me feel ill."

She learnt to conceal herself behind two personae: "Willie" the rebel child, who attacked the world back, and "Carol", a giggling and complaisant extrovert. She ran through a series of jobs, sometimes disastrously, as a machinist she put buttonholes all over a fur coat, not realising they had to go in any particular place, sometimes with success. Her passion for arranging things made her a wonderful stockroom assistant in a department store.

In her twenties she gradually identified herself as Donna, complete with limitations. She does not look abnormal. Arriving for my first meeting, I find a slight girl in tan slacks with a constant air of being poised for flight. By appalling mischance, on her first evening in London Ms

Williams's room was burgled. She might, warned her publisher, be more stressed than usual. Actually, she is fine and makes perfect sense.

The burglary seems to have touched her less than a normal person: perhaps if good-fellowship is a mystery to you, wickedness is less near the heart. "You've had bad fortune," I say as we walk out. "And much good fortune too. You cannot have one without the other," Ms Williams says, leading the way to the park with light, dancing steps. Her extreme literalness makes for these gnomish utterances. Once you learn to speak in simple linear sentences, as if translating from Latin, conversation is not too difficult. But "I don't understand the thing they call manners", she says. "It makes no sense at all." Her own questions have the directness of a child's.

Facts are easiest. So in the park we discuss ice-houses, ducks, why camels spit (she likes camels because she too spits when angry), and other readily concrete subjects. Ms Williams shows encyclopaedic, eclectic factual knowledge of everything from the pH level of swimming pools to the sex of trees. She would make a formidable scientist.

She stops by a sculpture. "You could practise on him,"

Being with people. See, you could poke your finger in his eye and nothing's changed." Then an unsolicited memory from her childhood: her angry mother used to try to prove herself, Ms Williams says, by giving her dolls. "I hated them. The more my mother hated me the bigger the dolls got." I observe that I hated dolls too and threw mine out of a ship's porthole. Ms Williams hugely approves of this, and I try a small bridge between us by saying that nobody should expect any child to like conventional things. "If the child says no—" "Ah!" Ms Williams says. "But I couldn't say, couldn't tell anyone..." It is a nightmare glimpse of her glassed-off world.

Once she helped an autistic child in a home by pushing aside the carter who was thrusting a doll at her, and offering instead a hairbrush to stroke repetitively. "Dolls stare at you. Their faces expect something. A hairbrush doesn't do that. It just goes 'prrrrr' and soothes you."

At the end of the walk we have reached a reasonable accommodation. Next day, we meet again. I look at her seldom and briefly. "If people look," she says, "their face is saying I order you to look at me." Her newest achievement is friendship: "My friendships are not just empty symbols of normality any more. I have gone from sharing nothing to sharing words, from sharing words to sharing facts, from facts to thoughts and now I am trying to share feelings. Now I must learn how to link my feelings to words and expressions. It is a new world."

She is reaching out towards the world with more intelligence than it ever used in trying to reach her. For that she should be honoured.

Summer madness: a tiny pollen grain from the garden hollyhock, left, or passion flower, right. The season miserable for those who are allergic

No way out: pollen grains from the Venice Mallow flower, left, and pot marigold make it impossible for people with allergies to open windows

Jeremy Laurance considers growing interest in allergies and a new report on treatment

Last year, Anne, a 41-year-old single mother living on income support, paid a private dentist £600 to remove all the fillings in her teeth because she believed she was allergic to the mercury in the amalgam. She stayed in a private allergy clinic for two weeks, where she was put on a Vitamin C drip to help her recover from the anaesthetics. The bill there came to £4,000.

She returned to the clinic in January for further vitamins and minerals and a course of "vaccines" to control her allergies. The bill came to £2,000. Her treatment was paid for by two local charities. She says she is better because she can do "almost all" the housework. But she is still unable to work or to leave the house and has to sleep every afternoon. Her GP has given her a 12-month sick note.

Anne was diagnosed five years ago as "allergic to everything" by the same clinic. "NHS doctors said I was neurotic and depressed. I was labelled with everything. Social workers threatened to take my son away. Only when I went to the clinic were my allergies unmasked."

Although she found the diagnosis comforting, life since then has been far from easy. "I can't even open the windows because of the pollen in summer and the mould spores in winter," she said. "I once counted that I had 80 symptoms and I can link them to at least 100 things that cause them. It's a dreadful existence. It's a struggle every day to keep your sanity."

Her nine-year-old son's health is deteriorating and he is missing school on an average of a day a week. "He is not coping emotionally," she said.

Cases like Anne's have alarmed specialists in the field. Allergies are increasing and awareness of them is growing. This is putting pressure on already overstretched National Health Service clinics. As a result, people with allergies are being forced to seek help from private clinics and fringe practitioners, who may make matters worse.

In response to the growing concern, the Royal College of Physicians this week published a report comparing conventional and alternative treatment of allergy. It is critical of the treatment offered by some fringe practitioners and their "false and misleading" claims.

Produced by a committee of leading NHS allergy specialists, the report warns that clinics offer treatments that have not been validated. It says patients may be harmed because of misdiagnosis or delays in treatment.

The report dismisses the techniques of homeopathy, clinical ecology, hair analysis, and kinesiology as having no scientific foundation. It gives credence to only two alternative treatments: hypnosis and herbal remedies, with a half-hearted endorsement of acupuncture.

Hypnosis can affect allergic reactions and may have a role in helping the asthmatic, it says. Similar effects have been claimed for acupuncture. The report also accepts that traditional Chinese medicinal plants have been shown to help children with eczema.

About 10 per cent of people suffer genuine allergies but many more believe they have them, and can become angry and upset when this is denied by conventional doctors.

A postal survey of 30,000 people published in the journal of the Royal College of Physicians in 1987 revealed 1,372, almost 5 per cent, believed they were sensitive to food additives, for example. But after further investigation the diagnosis was confirmed in only three cases.

Conventional treatment of allergy has had its share of criticism. In 1989, a leading article in the New England Journal of Medicine suggested a large proportion of people who consulted allergists had psychiatric problems and were seeking a socially acceptable label for them. "Through kindness and enthusiasm, many doctors may be doing a great disservice to ill persons seeking a non-psychiatric diagnosis," the report says. But conventional treat-

In the early 1980s a series of deaths were caused by the inappropriate use of desensitisation techniques in NHS clinics. The latest Royal College of Physicians report says more research is required to develop better treatments and that there are no grounds for complacency among conventional doctors.

These worries have surfaced as public interest in allergy has grown. The British Allergy Foundation, a charity launched last June to raise public awareness, has had 13,000 letters requesting information.

"We have been overwhelmed," a spokeswoman said. Professor Robert Davies, the charity's founder and a consultant physician at St Bartholomew's Hospital, London, said that true allergy was "quite restricted". "But if you don't feel very well or suffer from fatigue it is the fashion to attribute it to chronic allergy."

One in six people is estimated to suffer from allergies. Hay fever and asthma, the most common, are increasing. This is thought to be because of rising pollution, centrally-heated, dusty houses, and greater awareness among doctors. Multiple allergy to food and other substances is rare.

Patients who attend some private allergy clinics may, however, be tested less rigorously. Treatment can amount to "brainwashing", according to Dr David Pearson, director of the NHS allergy clinic at Withington Hospital, Manchester.

"You inject the patients with something that makes them sick as a dog and then give them another that makes them better and you suggest all the time that they've got the allergy and you've got the cure — so they go on to develop a Pavlovian response," he said. "There is very positive evidence that giving a false diagnosis of allergy prevents people obtaining the therapy that can help them. Many patients are sad, distressed people going through life crises."

He warned that people could be harmed by being given the wrong diagnosis and treatment. "If a patient has a genuine allergy it is potentially lethal to test for it by injecting an extract of the substance under the skin. I know of a case where a patient suffered a life-threatening reaction."

Dr Martin Stern, a clinical immunologist at the University of Leicester, said there was "extreme concern" about some of the practices of private allergy clinics.

"People are given tests the results of which are meaningless," Dr Stern said. "But because of the paucity of NHS services, people are at their wits' end about where to go for help." He said he had seen patients go to private clinics until they run out of money.

In Southampton, Professor John Warner, a consultant paediatrician, said he had seen patients who had been put on special diets by private allergy clinics that had caused malnutrition. "The parents of a child with cystic fibrosis (an inherited digestive disorder) went to a clinic where they were recommended to restrict certain foods, which is a disaster in cystic fibrosis. It is absolutely terrible that a private clinic could take on a patient like this for which there is proven treatment."

There are some private clinics that are "perfectly reputable", said Professor Warner, but others " verge on the lunatic" and practise a form of medicine that is "frankly dangerous". Patients seeking a "perfectly reputable" private clinic would be best advised to ask their GP for a recommendation.

The problem is that those seeking such help often do so because they feel their GP is not helping them. "The trouble is that a number of clinics are run by people who have no medical qualifications and so are not bound by the ethical codes that govern doctors. They can do what they like — and get away with it."

In-house killer

OWNERS of Tudor, and earlier, houses in Norfolk and Suffolk are so proud of the wattle and daub construction of the inner-walls that they have been known to cut small sections in the plaster so as to display it more readily to their guests. This primitive lath and mud construction is, potentially, as deadly in South America as it is quaint in East Anglia for it is indirectly responsible for one of the world's greatest public health problems: Chagas' disease.

Chagas' disease infects over six million people in Brazil, a million in Venezuela, uncounted tens of millions in the rest of South America and the occasional cases even as far north as Texas. In Britain, until recently, the only people likely to have heard of Chagas' disease, despite its rather peculiar name, were medical students hoping to score an alpha point when discussing heart failure. But last week the blood transfusion service in south London said that it would in future reject the blood of donors who had travelled off the beaten track in South America lest they have been infected with Chagas' disease.

In 1909 Carlos Chagas described a blood parasite, Trypanosoma cruzi, which has a life cycle divided between blood sucking reduviid bugs, colloquially known as assassin or kissing bugs, and the blood of mammals; neither birds or reptiles act as hosts. Often in South America the culprit is Rhodnius prolixus, which lives in the cracks of lath and mud houses. The bugs, which are nocturnal, congregate in the walls near a bed. If the blood they suck from a sleeping human is infected, the bug itself becomes a vector for the disease for the rest of its two-year life, and excretes the parasite on the flesh of its later victims.

MEDICAL BRIEFING

Chagas' disease is similar in many respects to African sleeping sickness, which is spread by the tsetse fly. It is divided into three stages. In the first stage an early sore at the site of the initial infection is followed in many cases by a feverish illness characterised by enlarged glands and spleen, and sometimes acute heart failure or meningitis: there is a five per cent mortality. Those who recover haven't seen the last of the disease, for after years or decades of a quiescent secondary stage, in which the patient is symptom-free, the final phase is reached. In the third stage an inflammatory reaction thins the walls of the heart so that they may rupture, or the patient may die of heart failure from weakened heart muscles. In other patients the gut becomes so dilated as the result of weakened muscles that food accumulates in a grossly distended gullet, or constipation, sometimes of many weeks duration, may kill through intestinal obstruction.

Treatment is possible in the first stage, although the drugs used are very toxic, but not thereafter as organs are damaged beyond repair by the time the diagnosis is made. Spraying the houses with insecticide is the favoured method of controlling the disease. The risk of transfusion has been acknowledged in South America for a generation, but recent cases in the United States have now alerted the British authorities hence their rejection of the backpacking student who returns from Colombia, Peru or elsewhere in South America.

Chemical danger

MERCURY poisoning has been in the news again. In Europe the controversy centres on the possibility of dental patients suffering from their mercury amalgam fillings, a risk which most authorities regard as negligible. In Britain, in fact, it is the dentist who moulds amalgam fillings with his bare thumbs who is in danger of mercury poisoning, and not the patient.

In Natal, South Africa, the Zulu community, and the trade union movement, are enraged because only recently has the government ordered an enquiry into the Thor chemical plant, a British-owned firm, where the workers claim that at least nine employees have suffered from mercury poisoning.

Mercury poisoning can cause swollen gums and central nervous system symptoms, muscle weakness and tremor. Patients also show mental changes including paranoia and hallucinations. These symptoms are described by doctors as erethism. An employee who develops erethism becomes timid, depressed, and obsessed by fear of losing his job, and yet furious and aggressive if supervised or even watched.

The likelihood of danger of mercury poisoning is assessed by estimating the amount of mercury excreted in a 24-hour specimen. It is likely that a urinary excretion of more than 300 micrograms would be associated with symptoms. In the UK the accepted safe upper limit is 50 micrograms. There seems to be agreement between employers and employees in Natal that this figure has been exceeded many times.

A straightforward treatment

CARLOS CHAGAS belonged to this century, and the disease named after him infects millions. Dr François de la Peyronie, physician to Louis XV, has also given his name to a disease, but the problem he describes only affects a few thousand men, at the very most, in this country. Even so Peyronie's disease is very distressing to those men who suffer from it but — as with most male genital diseases — it receives little or no publicity.

The plaques which form under the skin of the palm of the hand, and less often the foot, to cause Dupuytren's contractures were well known even before Margaret Thatcher had surgery to correct hers; less often appreciated is that similar plaques can occur in the cavernous sheaths of the penis. As the plaque thickens and contracts the penis deviates, vertically or horizontally, on erection. Sometimes the angulation is so acute that penetration becomes impossible. Until recently the only effective treatment has been surgery; thereafter the penis is left shorter but functional.

Research at the Institute of Neurology, now based at the Middlesex Hospital in London, has shown that if patients with Peyronie's disease are treated during the initial stages when the plaques are still painful, with Tamoxifen, the drug better known for its use in breast cancer treatment, they may disappear and the penis is straightened without surgery. Not a great leap forward for mankind but a sound medical advance which will make the sufferers, and their partners, profoundly grateful.

Dental costs in France are so high that people are coming to Britain for their treatment

The French live in fear of dentists, not so much because of the cost. Exorbitant charges mean they visit the dentist only when absolutely necessary, and avoid regular check-ups. British nationals resident in France, shocked at dental costs, are travelling back to Britain in the holidays for treatment; and increasing numbers of French are taking day trips to England for their teeth, for which they are reimbursed through French social security and Mutuel, a private health scheme.

Francis Rubel from Calais says: "Dental treatment in England is about a quarter of French prices and I also benefit through almost total reimbursement in France."

Matthew Wallis, a British teacher working in Paris, was recently quoted as FFr20,000 (£2,000) for a replacement tooth, two crowns and two fillings. Mr Wallis checked other dentists and found the price was normal. One even quoted FFr28,000. "It was a nasty shock," Mr Wallis said. "Fortunately a British dentist is prepared to do the work for about FFr4,000 during the school holiday period."

At present, 8,000 British teachers are employed in France. One of them, Stephen Childs, who has been working in Versailles for eight years, says: "At first I paid up. Now I just arrange like most other teachers to have dental check-ups in England during the holiday period."

Teachers are not the only ones to feel the pinch. Brian Ford, a manager for a transport company based in Lille, admits he has continued having check-ups and treatments with his London dentist because it is much cheaper. Curiously, cleaning teeth in France has a low priority. A government health survey last year showed that 40 per cent of French people did not clean their teeth every day because it was considered unimportant: woman placed a higher priority on facial make-up and men on their hair.

Dentists in France are self-employed and say the prices reflect their overheads. An average crown costs between FFr3,000 and FFr10,000 and a filling between FFr800 and FFr2,000 depending on the work required. A replacement tooth can cost FFr14,000.

In Britain, a crown costs £60 on the NHS and £150-£250 privately. Fillings are up to £10 on the NHS and up to £50 privately. A replacement tooth would be about £33 on the NHS and £80-£150 privately. Each French worker pays 5.9 per cent of his or her salary towards medical and dental care. This ensures a third of dental costs are refunded up to FFr500. Mutuel insurance cover averaging FFr150 a month insures a further refund of up to 50 per cent of costs to a limit of FFr1,500.

Dental costs are fixed by the government, allowing dentists an average of 30 per cent profit on each patient. A dentist with a large number of patients can earn £100,000 a year without difficulty.

One dentist admitted a number of patients had trouble meeting payments for lengthy work. Some took out bank loans to pay for treatment or staggered payment. "Only 20 per cent of my patients have regular check-ups," he said. "The other 80 per cent just come when they have some sort of problems."

He blamed lack of education and publicity for ignorance concerning dental care.

Propaganda or the simple truth?

Ann Kent reports on what women can expect when taking HRT

Three hundred women had filed into Church House, Westminster in central London to find out about the menopause, and now one of them stood up to ask a question. "What happens if you stop taking HRT. Do you just fall apart?"

The audience, mainly intelligent, middle-aged and middle-class, were not surprised by the question. Women are drenched in information about hormone replacement therapy (HRT) and the menopause, but all too often it comes in the form of propaganda.

Teresa Gorman, the MP who founded the Amaran Trust to promote HRT, has said: "I know from my own experience that it [HRT] can do more to improve the quality of your life... than pots of expensive face cream, a holiday in Spain or a complete new wardrobe of clothes."

Opponents of the treatment, such as Germaine Greer, believe women should feel free to age with dignity, accepting the physical consequences. "A grown woman should not have to masquerade as a girl in order to remain in the land of the living", she wrote in her book about the menopause, The Change.

Val Godfree, the deputy medical director of the Amaran Trust, tried to reassure the woman who wondered about the effects of stopping HRT. "A large number of ladies take HRT for a short period of time and then come off it. They don't fall apart, but their bones will lose their strength and the risk of heart disease rises," she said.

In fact, the effect of stopping HRT after a few years is to put a woman at the same risk of the bone thinning condition, osteoporosis, and heart disease as she would have been if she had never taken HRT at all.

The menopause conference last week was organised by the National Council of Women after a survey of its members revealed that 62 per cent wanted more information about the menopause.

Female hormones are often discussed at medical conferences, usually by male medical experts talking to other men. The questions asked at this meeting were sharper and more relevant because the women were interested not in tinkering with drug formulations, but in whether it was safe for them to use, how long they could take it, and whether the NHS could afford to provide it for them.

Side effects of HRT, described as "rare" at medical conferences, could not be easily swept aside here, as the sufferers stood up to tell of problems such as painful breasts, putting on two stones in weight in two months or zig zags in front of their eyes.

The Amaran Book of Hormone Replacement Therapy stresses the way HRT can slow the ageing process, but the revitalising, feed-good factor which is so often attributed to HRT was not mentioned at the meeting. Those who asked questions were more interested in health than in dreams of eternal youth.

HRT is usually started when the first symptoms of the menopause — irregular or non-existent periods, hot flushes and night sweats — appear. The principle behind it is simple enough. Between the ages of 45 and 55, women start to produce less oestrogen, the natural hormone that protects women against heart disease and osteoporosis. By replacing the missing hormone, vulnerable women can delay the onset of these diseases. However, oestrogen on its own can cause cancer of the womb lining. Unless the woman has had a hysterectomy, the hormone progesterone is added to the treatment. Although earlier fears that progesterone might block the protective effects of the oestrogen on the cardiovascular system now seem largely unfounded, it does bring on the menstrual period. If a woman uses HRT she will need to carry on using sanitary protection.

One of the most important questions for any woman contemplating HRT is how she can balance the risks and benefits. Some experts believe that HRT slightly increases the risk of breast cancer; others disagree. Doctors take the line that they will provide the woman with the facts, and leave her to make the final decision. But as it took a conference of medical experts three days to thrash out a consensus on this single issue last autumn, the average patient can hardly be expected to know what is best for her.

The two women physicians at last week's conference could not agree on the relative risks and benefits of HRT. "If there is an increase in risk, it is a small one which is controllable," Dr Godfree said. But Dr Jean Coope, a Cheshire GP who provides HRT for her patients on the NHS, believes the risk increases significantly after around ten years of treatment. After five or six years on hormone replacement, Dr Coope sends her patients for a mammogram before renewing the prescription.

Mr Tony Parsons, a consultant gynaecologist and the chairman of the Menopause Society, believes women need to be on HRT for at least two years to benefit from it, but agrees that after about ten years the risks increase.

According to Mr Parsons, the statistics have concluded that, at worst, of 100,000 women on HRT for 15 years, 187 more would die from breast cancer than those not taking hormones. However, this had to be set against the expected reductions in osteoporosis and heart disease fatalities. Among women on HRT, deaths resulting from a fractured hip are estimated to drop by 563 and from heart disease by 5,250.

So what would Mr Parsons tell a close female relative who wanted to use HRT longer than ten years? "I would certainly want to explain the uncertainties," he said. "People vary greatly in their reactions. Some women will have nothing to do with any treatment which involves even the slightest risk of breast cancer. Someone who has nursed a relative who has had a stroke or hip fracture may look at it quite differently."

Another puzzling aspect of HRT is why its adherents focus on its ability to stop bones from thinning when only one woman in four is susceptible to osteoporosis. Suggesting that all women take hormones would appear to be the equivalent of dosing everyone in an office with antibiotics when only one of them has an ear infection.

Mr Parsons suggested that women considering HRT might have a bone scan to see if they are one of the unlucky 25 per cent, although they may well have to get this done privately. Alternatively, they may share his view that the protection offered against heart attacks and strokes is enough in itself to justify the use of HRT.

However, Mr Parsons accepted that many women do not really like hormone replacement therapy. So what are the alternatives?

Dr Ignac Fogelman, a consultant physician and bone-scanning expert from Guy's Hospital, London, quickly punctured hopes on middle-aged do-it-yourself bone-building. "Diet and exercise are important in adolescence, but jogging round the block and filling yourself with calcium are a joke at 50. They won't touch menopausal bone loss," he said. "For that you need HRT."

At the end of the conference my own feeling was that hormone replacement was acceptable, at least for the first ten years. However, this was not a unanimous view. The audience left the conference better-informed but not necessarily converted to the treatment. Perhaps the generation of women who road-tested what we now regard as a very high-dose Pill is not prepared for further experimentation.

Or it may be that Mr Parsons hit on the real problem. He said it takes half an hour to discuss hormone replacement properly with a patient who already knows something about the subject. Most doctors don't have the time, and many women are rightly suspicious of the busy medic whose only treatment is a briskly written prescription.

Judging the milk of humankind

Researchers have suggested that breast-feeding may make brighter children. What should mothers believe?

Breast is best. Breast-feeding is natural and delivers exactly the right food at the optimum temperature. It creates a loving bond between mother and child and delivers immunity from illness and infection. It also, according to the latest research, gives children a valuable intelligence boost.

This is what new mothers are told these days — but is it all true? In recent weeks, there has been a world-wide debate raging among doctors and scientists as to whether there are magical ingredients contained in breast milk which confer superior intelligence.

The recent findings of Dr Alan Lucas and his team at the Dunn Clinical Nutrition Centre in Cambridge, and published in The Lancet, seemed to show that, at eight years old, children who had been given breast milk at birth — whether or not they were actually breast-fed — did better in IQ tests than those given formula feeds.

This extra intelligence seemed to be due to something in the milk, rather than whether the parents were more intelligent or gave more attention.

Dr Lucas' conclusions, based on a sample of 926 premature babies, were hotly disputed by other researchers. Two large-scale studies, one carried out in Melbourne, Australia, and the other at Wayne State University, Detroit, in the United States, found that breast-fed children were brighter than the bottle-fed, but concluded that these differences were solely attributable to the greater intelligence and superior parenting of mothers who breast-feed.

In other words, these researchers could find no magic IQ factor in the milk alone. But the implication of these three studies is clear: mothers who really care about the intelligence and well-being of their children will never shove a bottle in their mouths.

During the 1960s, when the fashion for bottle-feeding was at its height, new mothers had to struggle to be allowed to breast-feed their hospital-born babies. All has changed. Thanks to intense campaigning by the National Childbirth Trust's (NCT) Breastfeeding Promotion Group, now celebrating its 25th anniversary, and also the American La Leche League, breast-feeding is encouraged at every turn.

The La Leche League is particularly militant about breast-feeding, with its insistence that feeding should be completely baby-led, and continue until the child wishes it to stop. This means that it is not all that unusual for toddlers and even two and three year olds still to be breast-fed.

Any new mother who finds breast-feeding difficult or who is not sure she wants to become a 24-hour milk-dispensing machine can now contact, free of charge, a breast-feeding counsellor, who will come round to her house to persuade her to give her baby "the best start in life". But does all bottle and no breast really make for dull children? Dr Lucas, the head of infant and child nutrition at the Dunn Nutrition Unit, denies that he is trying to give mothers yet one more thing to worry about.

He says: "Our study has stimulated an enormous amount of debate, but what many press reports chose to ignore, is that our study concentrated solely on premature babies."

"Our data shows very strongly that there is a definite relationship between receiving breast milk and subsequent IQ even after making all the adjustments for the social class and intelligence of the parents — for premature babies."

"As some of these babies were fed with expressed breast milk because they were too small and weak to suck, it seems to us that breast milk, and not just breast-feeding, is important for subsequent cognitive development."

A number of ingredients in breast milk, such as special fats and thyroid hormone, are thought to be important for brain development and are not present in cows' milk. Formula feed manufacturers have been unable to introduce these fats into their products, as they turn the milk rancid.

"At the moment," Dr Lucas says, "we can say that there is compelling evidence that breast milk itself enhances the intellectual development of premature babies — but no actual proof.

"We simply don't know whether there is any similar benefit for full-term babies, as we have never carried out any such studies. There seem to be strong health advantages of breast milk for pre-term infants, but all may be different for full-term babies.

"There is as yet, no hard evidence whatever that bottle-feeding in the West damages babies in any way, or puts them at a disadvantage."

Shirleyanne Seel, the deputy head of policy at the National Childbirth Trust, has been a breast-feeding counsellor for many years. She says: "Research undertaken two years ago clearly showed that breast-fed babies suffer less from gastroenteritis, but evidence for long-term benefits is much less clear cut."

In fact, a paper in The Lancet in May 1988, said there was little evidence to suggest that breast milk did confer any significant long-term health benefits to babies.

"At the same time," Ms Seel says, "we feel it is the baby's right to be fed with the best possible food." She confirmed that it is mainly the older, middle-class mothers opting for the breast. "Although at the NCT we are working hard to change the overwhelmingly middle-class image that breast-feeding continues to have."

As a zoologist, I implicitly believe that breast must be best, but there are simply no studies that show an overwhelming long term advantage either in terms of health, intelligence or personality. The studies carried out so far assume a cause and effect — but for all we know, there may be no actual correlation at all."

Newcomer with a hint of nostalgia

The Indian stationmaster had to blink twice before he realised that he really was seeing the car that he thought he was seeing. "I know this car. It should not be in Britain," he shouted from the entrance of Wapping station in east London as I drove past him in my bulky Hindustan Ambassador.

He was almost right. The Ambassador is built in Calcutta and has never before been exported from the sub-continent.

The Ambassador usually finds its market among taxi-drivers and middle classes in India willing and able to charge through crowded streets in cars that use technology almost 50 years old.

One look at the Ambassador, however, betrays its origins to any British driver who is over the age of 35. The car is, of course, the old Morris Oxford, a stalwart saloon made by Austin-Morris between 1948 and 1959, and it very much belongs in Britain.

The lines are distinctively British. The curved boot and bonnet signal instantly that it came from the pencil of a designer sitting in Cowley, Oxford.

When the now defunct British Motor Corporation, better known as BMC, pensioned off the old, round-bodied Cowley, the company found an eager buyer for the assembly lines in India, which was desperately trying at that time to found its own motor industry.

That industry was founded on the name of Morris. The old Morris Minor and Oxford provided the two most important model lines.

A car that is built in India reminds Britain, and

The bizarre twist is that three decades on, the Morris Oxford is making a comeback in Britain to an enthusiastic response from drivers with memories stretching beyond the jelly-mould shapes that pack the showrooms of today.

Mark Owen-Lloyd and Jo Burge both worked in the City until they decided to stop trading in "computer money" and bring in the Hindustan Ambassador through their Fulbore Motors company at Fulham in southwest London.

Mr Owen-Lloyd, for seven years a bond dealer, said: "We found out about the car and started making enquiries. The company was fascinated because they had never thought about exporting before."

The company was particularly surprised to have approaches from the seat of the Raj, which had thrown away the old Morris Oxford in the first place to the Indians so that they could make and rebadge it as their own.

When The Times first disclosed that the car was coming back to Britain, the newspaper and Fulbore were inundated with calls.

There are now about 2,500 people in the company's order bank lusting for a car that harks back to days when motoring seemed somehow more relaxed and even stylish.

I was the first to drive the Ambassador in Britain and reactions to the car were astonishing. Motorists stopped to gawk and pedestrians peered with interest.

What they saw was an immensely attractive car. Even though it came off the drawing board shortly after the second world war, the Oxford remains an attractive shape with distinct echoes of the Morris Minor's rounded nose.

The interior is also fairly plush. My car was completed in an attractive grey with chrome door handles and side-light window openers. Bench seats, standard in India, have been replaced with some extremely comfortable individual seats in the model built for Britain, and the original metal dashboard is replaced with a newer, plastic version.

However, it is under the bonnet that purists will find their delight. At a time when car engines are a mass of computer chips and swirling wires, here is an original BMC B-series 1500cc engine with a Lucas battery and starter motor.

If this car pegs out at the side of the road, forget the AA. Simply roll up your sleeves and start tinkering because the engine will be so easy for the enthusiast to work on.

A surprisingly wide variety of people seems to want the car, from taxi-drivers in Brighton to buyers of cars in the cheap car market, who look at the competition and discover a model with bulk and masses of interior room and boot space.

So what is the Ambassador like to drive? The truth is that it is like a car that is 40 years out of date. The four-speed gearbox is a trial and there is only 55 brake horsepower to pull all that metal, although a 1.8-litre Isuzu engine will be available later.

The car has a mind of its own, making the steering an approximation rather than an exact science, and the brakes require a definite Fred Flintstone-style foot-hard-on-the-floor method.

However, a little patience and a little practice will overcome those obstacles, and the sheer pleasure of owning such a distinctive car must compensate for some of the drawbacks.

A new-found market: the Ambassador, top, at Fulbore Motors. Above: how the Morris Oxford attracted attention in 1948

Fulbore expects to import as many as 250 cars, which would make the Ambassador, not Morris Oxford, a familiar sight on Britain's roads for the first time in more than 30 years.

The car will doubtless be welcomed by those who remember the motoring heritage of the Morris badge.

● The price in Britain will be £5,495 on the road for the four-year 1500cc model and for five-speed 1800cc £5,895 on the road. Synchronism from second gear upwards. Further details: Fulbore Motors, 071-371-5931

Brakes alert

CITROEN is recalling 170,000 cars for checks on possible faults to the braking system. The checks are on the best-selling BX range, built between 1983 and 1990, and apply only to right-hand-drive models. Owners should take their cars to their local dealership, where an investigation will be carried out free of charge.

Saab success

SAAB, Sweden's executive car maker, has achieved a 6.83 per cent share of the British market in the first quarter of this year, its highest share since Saabs were first imported more than 30 years ago.

Sporty double

TWO sporty cars out this week: from Volkswagen the 2.8-litre Golf VR6, the first model in its class with such a meaty power pack, and the Vauxhall Astra 2.0i Convertible. The Golf VR6 is long awaited and offers 174 brake horsepower for 140mph performance at £18,400 for the five-door version. The Astra will be made in a batch of 288 with the Exclusive badge for £12,707.

Easter drive

BROOKLANDS continues its drive to revive Britain's first purpose-built racetrack with an Easter event featuring car stalls and entrance to the museum.

Some hype

BE honest, you did not notice, but Renault not only has a new badge but also something called a new "visual identity package". The Renault diamond badge is replaced by a lozenge-style badge, which, a press release reports, highlights the company's "demanding quality standards, forward modern image and symbolises the concept of Renault products, adding flair to motoring with a combination of driving pleasure matched to quality service with consistent care for safety and the environment". All that from the little lozenge.

A family favourite that refused to die

NAME the car owned by more people in Britain than the total for the Rover 200, Vauxhall Nova and Reliant Robin combined.

Stumped? That is probably because the model still owned and loved by 2.7 per cent of all motorists has been out of production for ten years: the Ford Cortina.

but for the picture painted of the real world of car ownership.

Although the advertising agencies may not like the idea, most drivers count their pennies and are more likely to buy a second-hand car than new. Seventy per cent of motorists in the survey drove a used car, which they bought for an average price of £2,700. Sixty per cent bought British.

Ford dominates with three out of every ten cars on the road. Not surprisingly, the Escort, a best seller for eight years in the 1980s, is the most widely driven car, owned by 9.7 per cent of Britain's 23 million motorists. In second place is the Fiesta.

Among men, the most popular car after the Escort is Vauxhall's Cavalier (owned by 7.1 per cent) and Ford Sierra (5.8 per cent). The most popular woman's car is a Ford Fiesta, accounting for 9.6 per cent of ownership.

The Cortina, number seven in the top ten, was a mould-breaker in its day, the first car to use aircraft-style stressing techniques to give a strong monocoque body. In its first guise in 1962, the model helped set Ford's fortunes afloat and to put it into competition with the then dominant Austins and Morris.

The last Cortinas were, however, much less memorable than their forebears. It is that last, bulky incarnation which is still seen on the roads and still seems to be a mainstay of motoring for many British families.

Who owns the last of the Cortinas? The survey shows the car owned by a spread of age groups but the contrast is in the social grades. Only 1.4 per cent of ABC1 motorists confess to owning a Cortina while the figure rises to 4.1 per cent among C2DEs and the car rises to sixth in the top ten list among their grade.

The survey also found that the British motorists covers about 8,000 miles a year, mostly to and from work and for shopping and family outings. He has little interest in maintaining his car himself, leaving repairs to the local garage.

Why is Africa poor? Tony Robinson in Tanzania (9.40pm)

- 9.40 The Comic Relief Snappily Titled and Utterly Spondonious Stab at Explaining Why So Many People in Africa Are So Damn Poor.
● CHOICE: The centrepiece of Red Nose evening is a documentary from Tanzania about a man, Tony Robinson, with the help of local material, and inserted sketches featuring the likes of Peter Sissons, Richard Wilson and Jim Broadbent, he presents a lay person's guide to why Africa is poor. Those who have sat through sober documentaries on BBC2 or Channel 4 will find nothing new but it is right to return to the arguments and make them accessible to a wider audience. Using a jocular style for a serious purpose, the programme explains the effects of unfair trade, the debt burden, environmental damage and bad government, all compounding the vulnerability of powerless people (319140)

9.00 Arena: An Argentinian Story
● CHOICE: A trio of films from director Jana Bokova promises to present an Argentinian "newer before seen on British television". Her concern is not, thankfully, to present yet another retrospective of the Falklands conflict but to explore lesser-known corners of Argentinian life and culture. Tonight's programme is a celebration in images and song of the gaucho, whose place in his country's mythology is similar to that of the cowboy in the United States. The great age of the gaucho, who were the 19th century. But the lives on, roaming the pampas, breaking in horses and gathering round the fire in the evening to sing of a hard and simple life. Bokova's portrait shows short of sentimentality though you sometimes feel that these grizzled herdsmen have been preserved to provide footage for visiting film crews (2123)
10.00 Film: These Foolish Things
● CHOICE: A short series of films from the French director Bertrand Tavernier opens with the intimate chamber piece which brought Clint Eastwood back to the screen after a gap of 13 years. Bogaarde plays an English father seeking reconciliation with the half-French daughter (Jane Birkin) he emotionally neglected as a child. His wife and the daughter's mother (Cécile Laure) is the other main character in a film which revolves on a series of family discussions in which the trio look back over the past, assess their relationships and attempt to exorcise points of tension. With its emphasis on dialogue rather than action These Foolish Things is well suited to the television screen while Bogaarde's performance, subtle, intelligent and moving, confirms him as one of our finest film actors. Let us hope it is not his farewell (942814)
11.45 Film: Pete Kelly's Blues (1995). Jack Webb, Janet Leigh and Lee Marvin star in this tough cut thriller with a 1920s jazz background. Webb also directs (988833)
